TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE FATHER OF ARTS AND ARMES, CHARLES

LORD HOWARD, BARON OF EFFINGHAM, Earle of Nottingham, High Constable of the Castle and Forrest of Windsor, Lord chiefe Iustice in Eyre of England, Gouvernour and Captaine generall of all her Maiesties maritime Forts and Castles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Suffex and Surrey, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, and one of her Maiesties most honourable priue Councell.

*R*ight Honourable, there is a saying in Zenophon most worthy the citing and insight, that matters of worth and consequence are both to be committed and commended to their trust and protection; who know the waight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the same by Authoritie and Reason. For this cause and vpon this ground, I haue chosen your Honour out for a most noble patron of this most famous and accomplished Historie of the Jewes: which (for dignitie and antiquitie of the subiect, the elegancie and puritie of the stile, the choise proprietie and copie of words, the grauitie and varietie of sentences, the alterations and memorable euent; and lastly, for the birth and dignitie of the Author) requireth a spirit of no lesse wisdom, courage, and nobilitie then your selfe, who haue power to defend, and knowledge to discerne the worth thereof. Vouchsafe therefore to leuell the eie of your esteeme vpon the Center of this happy Historie: and as Themistocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophees; and Alexander in seeing Achilles tombe, did grievously sigh with an honourable emulation: so let the Zeale, magnanimitie, and admirable constancie which euery where affronteth you in this Booke (and raiſeth the best mindes from the boundlesse troubles of this world, and draweth eth them into the contemplation of true perfection) so settle your most berable loue & affection to emulate the same, that as for glory in Aeneas yet so for preserving and protecting Artes, you may outstrip your competitors, and amasse too curious expectation. And in mine opinion the time chalengeth no lesse at your hands: for as your transcendent dignitie and courage hath returned vs a happy baruest in our expected and long possessed peace, as by your second care and diligence next vnder her sacred Maiestie we all reape the fruit and felicitie of blessed abundance; so by your example in reading and respecting both learning and the learned, you shall pull downe that Babel, which confused ignorance hath raised to ouerreach industrie; yea you shall strengthen the weakned abilitie of learning, which (alas the while) is now adadies like a commoditie without request scarce saleable by the hands of a cunning broker. Nothing is more worth money, and lesse in request: onely the worlds blinde creatures (as S. Hierom tearmeth them) the vnlettered, take delight in their errors, whose writings (as Plutarch speaketh of Aristophanes poeme) are written for no moderate mans pleasure. Let therefore your vpriight estimation of this worke (most noble Earle) awaken the dead deuotion of such as contemne Artes; and let no such crrrupt drones (as make sale of sinfull thoughts for good marchandise) buz about the biue of true science: But as Emperors, Kings, and Princes haue euer in their Greeke, Italian and French, with a respectiue acceptance, and bountifull hand, entertained this Historie; so let this translation of Iosephus which courteth you now in English, be accepted at your hands, and countenanced by your Honour: for whose vnconfined felicitie both I and other of my name haue euer praied, and will neuer cease to study.

Your Honors vnfaignedly deuoted,

THOMAS LODGE.

TO THE COVRTEOVS READER.

As touching the vse and abuse of Historie.

IF Historie were as easily conceited and made vse of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the gouernment of mans life; I should hold it no sinne, so precisely to prescribe a limitation and bound, to such as should enter the List, and consult with example: for what more pleasing to our selues, or profitable for societies could euer befall vs, then in this theatre of mans life, (wherein Historie affordeth all sorts of Actors) to sit and learne preuention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wise by forraine wreckes? All which being traduced to our priuate vses, we may either as partners in what we haue past, or obseruers of future casualties, by precedent euent, tie ages to our memories; and preuening our escapes, by suruey of other mens repentance, briefly beget experience by sight, or foresight of worldly casualties, and forme a mirror of forepassed errors, to foreiudge our future calamities. But for that it behoueth vs to enter this worldly Academie, the more prepared, the more that Historie is fraught and fulfilled with plentifull fruite: and whereas the difficultie and difference is alike, to yeeld an vpriight verdict both of a mans owne, and other mens life; neither may any man rightly examine another (how wise soeuer he be) except in equall ballance he weigh his owne imperfections; it must necessarily follow on both sides, that with the more wisdom, and the greater obseruation wee ought to entertaine Historie, least our minde like the winde should wander vncertainly, and our deuotion should preuent our resolution; our esteeme, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furnished and affluent banquet; although some things, (and they to fewe men) seeme pleasant, other some to other are without taste and seeme tart, and euerie one iudgeth his meate not by prooffe, but by the palate; yet notwithstanding there is a certaine meane, which either Natures ordinarie, or the refined kind of nutriment (being simple and incorrupt) hath fashioned and fixed for most aptest for the bodie; from which whosoever varieth, or either beyond measure, or without iudgement, followeth his foolish appetite, in glutting himselfe beyond discretion, reapeth more incommodie then pleasure by these pleasures: So in the diuersitie of mans life, although a thousand formes, a thousand similitudes bee offered, and that euerie man fashioneth other mens manners to his minde, yet is there but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whosoever tracketh with iudgement, doth truely know the vse of life; whereas they that sit in a plentiful banquet, in affecting all things, can make vse of nothing. Now, how many are there, I pray you, that in respect of either of their owne, or other mens acts & words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choise in iudging minds, than meates, and that in this matter seemeth not sufficiently instructed? Wherein I wonder that men espie not their errors, whereas they imagine that Historie is the instructor of such as read the same; whereas it onely yeeldeth matter of instruction, even as the banquet ministreth meat according to euerie mans affection. Some therefore are seduced with the sweetnes of the stile, and in seeking their pleasure, lose their profit; who reape no other fruit off Historie, then to beguile time, and beget officious idlenes, laughing away houres, and nourish regent: others in reading glorie, hunt it in a shadow, where if they could make vse of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aspire to true glorie without true vertue, neither no wise man will hope further: yet see wee many men, that because they haue read many excellent workes, will bee Capricious and pretend wisdom; resembling those tragedians, who will, after they haue discharged themselves of their parts and apparell wherein they counterfained the Emperour, yet retain his Royall and princely manners: Some triuall and light witted, that make an Eclipse of a shadow, make more of the embleme, then the worke; the habit, then the Doctor: So admirable effects worketh History in mens minds. Now whereas it is the most exact and chiefest intent of Historie to awaken mens idlenes, and arme them against casualties, and the whole bent of example hath no other issue; it falleth out thorow mens securitie (who suppose that their neighbours perils concerne them not) that whatsoeuer is of note, is ouerslipped with a deate and sleeping iudgement, and things that memorie should best loue, are lost in her. To conclude, there are some that will haue euerie mans shooe fitted on their owne Last, and tie all mens pens to their owne pleasures: For which cause, partly by reason of this secret, partly thorow this ill ordered, confused and rash method of reading, as of corrupt humours, so is there growen a certaine καχεξία of iudgement and resolution: and as in intemperate bodies, meate yeeldeth very little profit; so reape they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maist easily conceiue, how a historie ought to be read: how mens liues ought in themselves be examined: finally how equal a proportion is required in both. And truly in my opinion, the chiefest ground of this difficultie, is the peruersnes of our iudgements: which is the cause, we rather respect our owne inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no lesse miserie then the former, that such as write, set downe such things as are acted, not onely for our profit sake, but to feede their owne humours: and like to certaine Archirets (by interposing their iudgements) doe vainely praise some things, supposing that our imitation should be tied to their pleasure; where if they performed what they ought to do, the Reader should encounter with no such distractions: but now, in like manner as Cookes, who rather respect their masters pleasurable taste, then his profit; would God the Historiographer did not affect flatterie. It therefore appeareth, that in two sorts (first in our owne iudgement; and next to the preiudice of those that write) wee are circumuented; in that they

they set not downe such euents as passe, in their owne nature and as they are. For he that writeth an Historie, is the interpretour of those things that are past: whose iudgement beeing depraued, it fareth with him as with the purest & most richest wine, which waxeth mustie by reason of that vessell wherein it is inclosed, or is by sophistication corrupted: which is the greatest folly, & most intollerable deceit that may befall men. They therefore, who negligently vndertake a History, (or suppose that life were to be past rashly, and without an exact obseruance of all offices) are no lesse deceiued then certaine countrey peasants in the last troubles of France (of whose follie I drewe some example) who attempting and entring vpon a citie not far off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries shop furnished with all kinde of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleasure, odours and delight of the confections they tasted; and supposing all to be of the same kind, deuoured, tasted, and swallowed downe euerie thing: wherevpon some fell sicke of feauers, some grew phrensie, and many lost their liues to please their appetites; at leastwise, he that scaped best, gaue occasion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, so Historie (the image of life) is fraught with pleasure, and displeasure; and onely in the vse of life, the wisdom of life consisteth. Farewell: vse this, and my selfe, as two twinnes borne for thy profit.

For the better understanding of the Coines and Measures, whereof there is some mention made in this Historie, obserue I pray you that which followeth.

Sath was a measure containing about some seuen pintes French.

The Ephra contained three Saths.

The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to say thirty Saths, and was the same measure both in drie and liquid things.

The Log contained a French measure.

The Hin contained twelue Logs.

The Bath contained as much as the Ephra.

The Cad was a kinde of pitcher containing such a quantitie as a young maiden might well carrie.

The common Sicke contained the waight of foure ounces, whether it were of gold, siluer, or of any other metall.

The sacred or holy Sicke waighed halfe an ounce of any metal whatsoever.

The common Sicke of siluer was valued at about some shilling of our money.

The holy Sicke of siluer was valued at about some two shillings.

The common Drachme was the eight part of an ounce.

The sacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.

The pound waighed twelue ounces.

The ordinarie Talent contained fiftie foure pounds, eight ounces, and a quarter of Troy waight in any metall: yet was it not currant money, but a masse made vp after the manner of an ingot.

The sacred Talent contained one hundred pounds.

Furthermore note this for your better knowledge, that when as Iosephus quoteth the Olympiades without any specification of the yeeres therein contained, he ordinarily comprehendeth the space of foure yeeres complet.

Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath diuers significations amongst both Greekes and Latins (as the controuersie betweene Plinie and Diadorus Siculus may wel testifie) and for that diuers of our English translators haue sometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong; I pray you in reading this Historie, whereas any of these words occur, suppose them for one and the same measure of ground, and according to the Greekes account, (which I suppose Iosephus most respected in this Historie) conclude it to be either of 600. foote as the Olympique, that is of 120. paces, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foote, that is 200. paces. As for the Furlong, either multiply him 8. times to make him a Stade, or as an ouersight in the printing, let it passe with the Errata.

HEY that indeuour themselves to write Histories, seeme not (in my opinion) to haue one and the same intent and motiue, but diuers and verie different causes of their labours: for some of them are addicted to this studie, vnder pretence to exemplifie their eloquence, and vnder hope to purchase glory thereby; othersome to the end to giue them content, whose worthy actions they couch and commend in their writings, haue intermitted no time nor (to their power) spared no labour. Some there are that haueing bene present in person, and eye-witnesses in the execution of great affaires, haue necessarily bene enforced to reduce and digest the same in writing: neither wanted there some who seeing occurrences of high and necessary consequence

(which otherwise had bene buried in ignorance) haue bene incited (in respect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publishing thereof: now of these forenamed causes, the two last are they that incited me to the like. For the warre which wee had with the Romans, and the accidents and issues on both parts, (all which in person I beheld, and to my perill I haue learned) do compell me to declare the same; and the rather for that there are some, who in their writings, haue deprauid, and peruered the truth. I haue therefore taken this worke in hand, for that in my opinion the knowledge thereof, will be both pleasing and profitable to the Græcians: for it shall contain the antiquitie of our whole nation, their forme of common-weale, both translated and gathered out of the Antiquities and Chronicles of the Hebrews. Truth it is, that heretofore, and at such time also as I composed the History of the foresaid warre, I had projected and purposed with my selfe, to lay open to the world, how & whence the Iewes had their first originall, what alterations in fortune they had fallne into, by what lawmaker they had been instructed in piety, and incited to the exercise of vertue: how many warres they haue sustained by long and diuers times, and finally how against their will they haue been intangled in this last warre, which they waged against the Romans. But for that the content of this matter, was too ample and copious, I haue separated it apart, assigning therunto this treatise accomplished from the beginning euen vnto the end: afterwards in proesse of time (as it vsually hapneth to those that attempt matters of mighty consequence) I was surprized with a certain delay, and slothfulness that withdrew me from the translation of so waighy a matter, in an vnfamiliar and forraign language. action action; and especially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured of all learning, and who in especial, took G it for a pleasure, to take knowledge of the diuers occurrences of common weales: as he that had beene agent, in diuers affayres of importance, and sundry accidents, in al which he hath shewed a marvellous magnanimitie of courage, with an vnmoveable resolution to follow vertue. Being thus perswaded by him, who is accustomed to incourage those vnto good actions, whom hee perceiueth to be apt and prepared to performe things profitable and honest: and (that which is more) being ashamed in my selfe, that I should rather take delight to follow idlenesse, than addict my selfe to any laudable exercise; I inforced my selfe more courageously then before time, and (besides all that which hath been spoken) I haue effectually considered with my selfe, that our ancestors haue thought good to communicate and publish the knowledge of our Histories to the Grecians, if so be that any of them were curious to vnderstand the same. I haue found there- H fore that Ptolemy king of Egypt the second of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and desirous to store and gather bookes) was earnestly desirous, that our lawe and the rules thereof, and the prescript forme of our liuing should bee translated into the Greeke tongue.

And as touching the hie Priest Eleazar (who hath not beene second in vertue to any other whatsoeuer) he refused not to make the said King partaker of the effect of his desire: to which he had wholly contradicted, had it not beene the ordinarie course of our ancestors, nor to conceale from other men, what thing soeuer was honest. For which cause I haue helde it a matter no waies vndeceit for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that same great sacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (only in as much as concerned learning) I supposed many alio to be I no lesse affected to good letters then the king: for he vnderooke not to haue all the writings which we had, but those translators who were sent vnto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that vnto him which was in our lawe. But those things that are found written in the sacred bookes of holy scripture are infinite, being such as containe in them, the Historie of fue thousand yeares: in which diuers vnexpected chances, sundry fortunes of warre, and many changes of politike estates are discovered. In summe, if any one haue a desire to read this Histo-rie, hee shall principally learne and apprehend, that all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation to those men, who obserue the will of God, and are affraide to transgresse the lawes of his commandements; and that God hath prepared for such the crowne and reward of felicitie. Contrariwise, if they shall depart from the diligent obseruance thereof, that which is easie shall be made impossible, and their endeouours in their opinion good, shall end in in- K calculable calamities. For which cause I exhort all those that shall reade these bookes, to fixe their mind vpon God, and that they approue our law-maker, if (as it worthily deserued) hee hath considered the diuine Nature; and attributed to the same such actions as are alwaies agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanitie of fables, wherwith others are poisoned: although in respect of the length of time, and the antiquitie of things, hee might without controule faigne and imagine whatsoeuer vanities: for hee was borne more then two thousand yeares ago, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durst refferre the originall of their Gods; neither the deeds or lawes of men, whereof they make mention. But in pursuit of our Historie, the sequell of our discourse, shall declare all things exactly, and in conuenient order. For in compiling this worke, I haue promised to adde nothing, nei- L ther to pretermitt any thing: and for that all whatsoeuer we shall declare, doth almost wholly depend on the wisdom of our law-maker Moses; it is necessarie before all other things, that I speake somewhat of himselfe, least perhaps any man should wonder how this labour hauing beene enterpriued, to discover the words and workes of certaine persons, is also imploied for the greatest part in describing and discovering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moses thought it most especially necessarie, either for him that will rightly dispose his life, or impose lawes to other men, that first and in especial he haue the knowledge of the nature of God; to the ende that conceiuing in his minde the greatnes of his workes; hee might as much as in him lyeth, imitate his most vnequall example; and followe him with M all diligence. For it is impossible, that a law-maker being voide of this contemplation, should haue good sense; or that his writings should bee of any moment to induce them vnto vertue, who should receiue those lawes, except before all things they should learne, that God who is the father and Lord of all, and that seeth all, giueth happie life vnto those that follow him; and contrariwise inuironeth them with great calamities, who forsake the way of vertue and righte-ousnesse. Moses therefore intending to instruct his Citizeus in this doctrine, began not his ordinances with the treatise of contracts, and couenants, which we practise one with another, as other

- A other law-makers were accustomed to do: but he hath lifted their spirits on high to the end they might thinke on God, and on the ornament of this world made by him, perfwading that the most accomplished worke amongst all those things which God had made in the world, was the creation of vs men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety; then might he more easily perfwade them in the rest: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themselves vnto fables, haue in their discourse imposed on their gods the infamy of sins committed by men, and by that meanes haue brought to pass, that the wicked sort are yet more wicked and addicted to euill doing. But as touching our law-maker, after he had declared that God had in himself all vertue pure, and vnspotted, hee hath thought good that men also should endeavour themselves to be partakers of the same, and on those that neither conceiue nor believe those things, he inflicteth a grieuous B and inexorable punishment: I exhort the reader therefore to examine our writings according to this Maxime: for to those that consider after this manner, nothing shall seeme either absurd, or vnworthy the magnificence of God; by reason that all things haue their disposition conformable to the vniuersall nature, which our Law-maker hath declared sometimes obscurely, sometimes in conuenient allegories: grauely; and otherwise expressing that manifestly, and publishing that in plaine words, which he ought openly to make knowne. The causes whereof if any man would search, he might find a most deep and very Philosophicall contemplation; which I ouerslip at this present, without longer staying thereon: but if God shall giue me time I will inforce my selfe to compose it in a volume as soone as I shall haue finished this worke. For this present then I will apply my selfe, to expose those things which haue been done, beginning at the creation of the world, C according as Moses hath spoken, and I haue found it written in the holy Scriptures, which testifie and intreat to this effect as followeth.

female to accompanie and liue with him (for as yet there was no woman) and for that he thought it strange, that all other liuing creatures had their companions: God tooke one of his ribs from him at such time as he slept, and of the same he formed a woman; who beeing brought before him, he did acknowledge that she was made for him. Now in Hebrew a woman is called Tha, but this was called Eua, which is as much to say, as the mother of all liuing creatures. He declarerth also, that God planted in the East a garden, flourishing and adorned with all sorts of plants, amongst which was the tree of life, and an other the tree of intelligence, by which was knowne both good and euill. And after he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to keepe and cherish the plants. Now this garden is wared by a riuer that runneth the whole earth, which diuideth it selfe into 4. chanelis or riuers. That which is called Phison (which name signifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the land of India, and entereth into the great sea, and is by the Greekes called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tygris, they flow into the red sea. Euphrates is called Phora (that is to say disperſion or flower.) Tygris is called Diſlat (which signifieth streight and swift.) Gehon runneth by the countrey of Aegypt, and signifieth as much as coming from the East: the Greekes call it Nilus. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eate of the fruites of all other plants, and that they should abstaine from that of science; telling them, that at what time ſoeuer they should taſte of the ſame, they ſhould die the death. Whereas then at that time, all liuing creatures were at accord one with another, the Serpent conuerſing with Adam and his wife, was inflamed with enuie, for that hee ſaw they ſhould be happy if they continued in the obſeruatiō of Gods commandements: and that contrariwiſe, they ſhould caſt themſelues headlong into ruine and deſtruction, if they ſhould diſobey the ſame. He therefore maliciously perſwaded the woman, to taſte the fruit of the tree of intelligence, giuing her to vnderſtand, that the knowledge of good and euill was in the ſame; and that as ſoone as they had taſted thereof, they ſhould lead a life no leſſe happie then Gods: and by this meanes he cauſed the woman to fill, which tooke no regard of the ordinance of God. For hauing her ſelfe taſted of this fruit, and finding it pleaſant and delicious in taſte, ſhe perſwaded her husband alſo to taſte the ſame: at which time they vnderſtood that they were naked, & ſought meanes to couer themſelues: (for this fruit had in it ſelfe, the vernie to giue vnderſtanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then couered they themſelues with fig leaues, which they put before their priuities, eſteeming themſelues more happie then they were before, in that they had found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who before times was accuſtomed familiarly to talke with him) finding himſelfe guiltie of ſinne, hid himſelfe from his preſence: but God wondring hereat, asked him for what cauſe hee fled and ſhunned him at that time, whereas before time hee had taken pleaſure to talke familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had tranſgreſſed the ordinances and commandements of God, answered him not a word, but God ſpake vnto him after this manner: I had prouided for you the meanes whereby you might haue led your life without ſufferance of any euill, or ſenſe of any miſery: ſo that all whatſoeuer was requiſite for neceſſitie or pleaſure, might happen of it ſelfe vnto you, by my onely prouidence, without any trauell or care on your parts; which if you had well vſed, age had not ſo ſoone ouertaken you, but that you might haue liued many yeares: but thou haſt ſcorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandement. For in that thou art ſilent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of euill; of which thou findeſt thy ſelfe culpable: wherefore both olde age ſhall quicklier come vpon thee, and the daies of thy life ſhall be ſhortened. Adam excuſed his ſinne, and required at Gods hands, that hee would not be incenſed againſt him, laying the fault of that which had happened, on his wife, alledging that hee had offended by reaſon he was ſuborned by her: and the woman accuſed the Serpent. But at that time God puniſhed him, becauſe hee had ſuffered himſelfe to be overcome by the counſaile of a woman; that the earth thence forward neuer more of her owne accord ſhould bring forth fruit: but that when they had trauailed and almoſt deuoured themſelues in labour, it ſhould ſometimes giue them foode, and at other times reſuſe to ſuſtaine them. And as touching Eue, he chaſtiſed her with child-bearing, and throes in trauell, for that beeing her ſelfe deceiued by the Serpent, ſhe had drawne her husband by the ſame meanes into extreame miſerie. He tooke alſo from the Serpent his voice, and was diſpleaſed againſt him, * by reaſon of the malice hee had conceiued againſt Adam, and hee put venome on his tongue, declaring him an enimie both to man and woman; whom hee commanded to bruſe the head of the Serpent, as well for that the euill which chanced vnto men conſiſted in the head, as alſo in that being aſſaulted in that part he is moſt eaſily done to death. Moreouer hauing depriued him him of his ſeete, hee condemned him to ſlide and traile himſelfe along the earth. And after that God had ordained them to ſuffer thoſe puniſhments, hee tranſlated Adam and Eue out of the garden into another place.

CHAP. III.

Of the Poſteritie of Adam: and of the ten ages euen vnto the Deluge.

B Vt Adam & Eue had two male children, the firſt whereof was called Cain (which ſignifieth acquisition) and the ſecond was called Abel (which is as much to ſay as mourning) they had alſo daughters. Theſe brothers addicted themſelues each one of them to their particular exerciſes. Abel the younger honoured iuſtice, and (ſuppoſing that God was preſent in all his actions) hee alwaies and wholly fixed his thoughts on vertue: and his exerciſe was keeping of ſheepe. But Cain (being the wickedſt man amongst men, and addicted to vnſatiable deſire of profit) was hee that firſt found out the vſe of the Plough, and who killed his brother for the cauſe which inſueth. Hauing concluded among themſelues to ſacrifice vnto God, Cain offered the fruites of his labour, and planting; Abel preſented milke, and the firſlings of his ſolde: which ſacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather conſiſted of things produced of themſelues by the order of Nature, then that which a couetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from Nature. Hereupon Cain (being wroth becauſe his brother Abel was more honoured by God then himſelfe) ſlew his brother; and hauing hidden his body cut off ſight, he thought that ſuch a murder ſhould be concealed. But God (knowing well this fact) appeared to Cain, and queſtioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many daies ſince he had not ſene him; when as heretofore he had alwaies ſene him conuerſant before him. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what anſwer hee ſhould make vnto God) ſaid firſt that hee wondered what was the cauſe his brother was ſo long time abſent: and finally, agreed in that God continued the queſt, and did more exactly ſeek after him; hee ſaid he was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affaires. Then God reprobred and conuicted Cain of murdering his brother, and ſpake vnto him after this manner, ſaying, that he wondered he ſhould denie the knowledge of his brothers death, whereas he himſelfe had ſlaine him: notwithstanding he acquitted him of the puniſhment deſerued for this murder, by reaſon that Cain had done ſacrifice, and made requeſt vnto God, that it might pleaſe him to remit ſomewhat of the ſeueritie of his iuſtice againſt him: yet did God curſe him, and threaten to puniſh his ſucceſſors to the ſeventh generation. Then did hee driue him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for feare hee ſhould be encountered and taken by ſome ſavage beaſt, and that he ſhould periſh after that ſort) God commanded him to ſuſpect no dangerous euent for that cauſe, aſſuring him that he might ſafely trauaile thorow all regions, without being either aſſaulted or ſeaſed by ſavage beaſts: and hauing ſet his marke vpon him, by which hee might be knowne; hee commanded him to depart the countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had trauailed thorow diuers regions, hee builded Nais (it was a place ſo named) and made his aboad therein, and in that place had children. But hee receiued not this chaſtiſement for his better amendment, but rather became worſe and worſe: for hee abandoned himſelfe to all pleaſures of the bodie, making it his ſport to outrage thoſe with whom hee conuerſed, filling his houſe with riches gotten by rapine and violence; and inciting other men to follow his pleaſures and thefts, he became their Lord and maſter of all miſchieuous exerciſes: hee ouerthrew that ſimplicitie which men before that time had vſed in their mutuall ſocieties, by the inuentions of meaſures and weights; the ignorance whereof was the cauſe that the life of man was eſtranged from deceite: but in ſteede and place of free and auncient courage hee introduced fraud and deceit. Hee it was that firſt bounded the fields, and builded the firſt Citie, and made wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell therein. This Citie was named Enos, by the name of Enos his firſt begotten ſonne. But Iared was the ſonne of Enos, of Enos the firſt ſonne of Malehel, whoſe ſonne was Mathſala, who begotte Lamech, who had 77. children by his two wiues Sella and Ada: amongst whom Iobel the ſonne of Ada was the firſt that made Tents, and tooke delight to leade a paſtorall life; contenting himſelfe with the ſame. Iubal his brother germaine exerciſed muſicke, and inuented the Plaſterie and the Harpe. And as touching Thobel one of his ſonnes, by his other wife, hee ſurpaſſed all other his brethren in force, & brauely managed the affaires of warre, by which waies hee got more ample riches, and meanes to maintaine his life with more pleaſure. Hee it was that firſt inuented the Art of forging, and the ſhop alſo: and was father to a daughter named Naama. But Lamech being well exerciſed in Gods

6 In the year of the world 700. before Christ's birth: Cain the first-born of Adam, and his brother Abel, were both of them wicked, and they were both of them murderers. Cain the first-born of Adam, and his brother Abel, were both of them wicked, and they were both of them murderers. Cain the first-born of Adam, and his brother Abel, were both of them wicked, and they were both of them murderers.

But Adam, the first man made of earth (for the Historie requireth that I should returne to speake of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, betooke himselfe to beget children, highly affecting succession and posteritie, being about the age of two hundredth and thirty yeeres: besides which, after he had liued some seuen hundredth more, at last hee died: amongst whose children (which were many) hee had Seth. And for that it were to long to speake of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nourished and trained vp by his father to the yeeres of discretion; studied vertue, and left his succession heires, and followers, of his fanetrie: who being all of them well borne, remained in the world free from all contention, and liued happily: so that it neuer happened that any of them in any sort did iniurie to any man. These inuented the science of the celestiall bodies, and all that which concerneth the beauty and order of the lump. And to the end that their inuentions should not be defaced out of the memories of men, neither should perish before they were perfectly knowne: (inasmuch as Adam had foretold them of the generall destruction of all things after two sorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of waters) they made two pillars; the one of bricke, and the other of stone; and ingraued in each of them such things as they had inuented, to the end if that of bricke should be abolished by the ouerflowes and rage of waters, that other of stone should remaine, and expresse vnto men that which was imprinted therein for their instruction. That of bricke then was consecrated by them, and is in the countrey of Lycia euen at this present day.

CHAP. IIII.

7 IN this manner persecuted they during the course of seuen ages, honouring one God, the Lord of all things, hauing alwaies a respect of vertue. But afterwards in proceesse of time, they degenerated from the auncient institutions of their forefathers, neither observing humane lawes, neither continuing their accustomed seruice of God; and they that before time indolently exercised themselves in vertue, afterward with wife as zealous studie followed wickednesse; and grew at last to that height of impietie, that they prouoked Gods heauie displeasure against them. For diuers Angels of God accompanying themselves with women begendred outrageous infants, and contemners of all good, by reason of that trust they had in their forces, whose hainous actions were not much vnlike those which the Greekes haue in their fables stained of the Giants. But Noah perplexed and extremely displeased with such their misdemeanors, exhorted them to change their thoughts, and amend their misdeeds: and (seeing them mollified by no admonitions; but that they were wholly possessed with the pleasure which they tooke in vices) hee fearing lest they should kill him and his familie, left them to their loosenes, and with his wife, children, and all his familie departed into an other countrey. Then God (delighting in the iustice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreme malice, but also concluded to destroy all whatsoeuer creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, deuoid, and repurged from all impietie: he abridged also the life of them, so that they liued not any more so long time as they were wont, but only attained the terme of sixe score yeeres: and hee couered the land with waters, and by this meanes all of them were destroyed. Onely Noah esaped by the meanes and way which God had taught him in such manner as followeth: Hee builded an Arke of foure stages, in length three hundredth cubites: in breadth fiftie: and in height thirtie: into this he entred with his mother, his wife and his children and their wiues, purueying himselfe of all things requisite both for their sustenance and life: hee closed also therein all sorts of liuing creatures, two and two, Male and Female, for the conseruation of seuerie kinde, and of some of them seuen couples. The sides of this Arke were strong, and the couer also, so that no water could pearce the same, and whatsoeuer storme might come it was able to resist. Thus was Noah (by succession of nature) the tenth from Adam saued with all his household; for he was the son of Lamech whose father was Methusala.

A Sala the sonne of Enos, the sonne of Iared, the sonne of Maleel, who with diuers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the son of Seth, the sonne of Adam. This destruction hapned, the sixe hundredth yeare of Noahs age (and the second moneth, which was called Diuis by the Macedons, and by the Hebrewes Marfomane) for so haue the Egyptians distinguished the year (but Moses set downe Nisan for the first moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Israelites out of the thraldome of the Egyptians.) He made this lawe therefore, that all things which appertaine to diuine seruice, should take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in respect of the times and termes of buying and selling, and all other trafficke, he obserued the first policy of the yeere, beginning in December: Moses wrote that the Deluge began the seuen & twentieth day of the about named moneth which was the yeare two thousand sixe hundredth fifty and sixe, after the creation of the first man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth & death of great personages of that time are most exactly set downe.) At such time then as Adam was 230. yeares olde, his sonne Seth was borne vnto him, and the said Adam liued 930. yeares; Seth about the age of 250. yeares, began Enos, who after hee had liued 905. yeares, left the gouernment of his affaires to his sonne Cainan, whose hee had begotten about the 190. yeare of his age. After that Cainan had liued 910. yeares, hee had his sonne Maleel, begotten by him the 170. yeare of his age. The said Maleel hauing liued 195. yeares died, leauing his son Iared: who about the age of 162. yeares, engendred Enoch, who liued 962. yeares. After Enoch, succeeded his sonne Methusala, begotten about the age of 162. yeares, at such time as the said Enochs father was yet aliue: & after that Enoch had liued 365. yeares, he was taken vp vnto God (whence it commeth to passe that his decaise hath not been exemplified in writing). Methusala the son of Enoch, in the yeare of his age 187. yeares, had Lamech for his sonne, who liued 782. yeares, to whom he left the souerainty, hauing held the same 969. yeares. And Lamech after hee had gouerned 707. yeares, declared his sonne Noe for gouernour, at such time as the said Lamech had liued 182. yeares, which Noe gouerned for the space of 900. yeares.

All these yeares calculated into one summe, accomplish the time about written. Yet to perfect this accompt, we ought not to seeke out the decaise of these personages (for they liued in the same time that their children and successours did: but the onely thing we are to obserue, is their birthes. As soone then as God had giuen the signe, and that it began to raine for the space of whole fortie dayes, the water fell and ouerflowed the whole earth fourteene cubites high (which was the cause that diuers could not escape, because there was no means of flight, or place of refuge.) But as soone as the raine was ceased, the water began to decrease by little and little for the space of one hundredth and fiftie dayes, about the 27. day of the seauenth moneth. Noe perceiving then that the Arke was on ground vpon the top of a certaine mountaine of the countrey of Armenia, hee opened the same, and seeing the earth did a little discouer it selfe round about the same, hee conceiued some better hope and held himselfe satisfied: Some fewe dayes after, when the water was ebbed somewhat more; he sent out a Crow (desiring to knowe if the rest of the earth were deliuered from the waters, and whether without danger hee might issue out of the Ark:) but the Crow finding the earth bebayned in water, returned vnto Noe: who the sequenth day after sent out a Pigeon to finde out the estate of the earth, which returned beiried, and bearing in his nebbe an Oliue braunch: whereby Noe perceiued that the earth was deliuered from the Deluge; and hauing as yet expected seuen dayes more, hee set at liberty all liuing creatures that were in the Arke. But as soone as himselfe, his wife, and his familie, forsooke it, he offered sacrifice vnto God, and feasted and reioyced both he and all his household. The Armenians in their language haue called the place where Noe descended, by a name Aprobat (which signifieth as much as descent) and in that place euen at this present the inhabitants of that countrey shewe some remnant and memories of the same. All those that haue written strange histories, haue made mention of this Deluge, and of the Arke: among the number of whom is Berosus the Chaldean, who setting downe occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some say likewise that a certaine part of this Arke is in Armenia, neere to the mountaine of the Cordians, and that some men haue brought from thence some part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of that place are wont to vse in steade of a preservative against enchantment. Hierome the Egyptian also (who hath written the Antiquities of the Phancians) hath made mention of this matter: as also Mnaseus with diuers other: Nicholas Damascene of Damas likewise in his nintie sixt Booke speaketh heereof after this manner. About the Region of Mineans there is a great mountaine in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported that diuers retyred themselves for safetie during the time of the Deluge, and there escaped they: and that a certaine man borne on an Arke arriued vpon the highest top of that mountaine, and that certaine timbers of that bosome had bene kept a long while: and it may be that this is that whereof Moses the law-maker of the Iewes maketh mention. But Noe fearing least God (having condemned all men to a generall perdition) should euery yeare overflow the earth after this manner; offered burnt sacrifice vnto God: beseeching him, that hereafter hee would entertaine the auncient order, and that no so great calamitie might succcede, by which all liuing creatures should come in daunger to be vtterly extinct and exterminated: but that inflicting desired punishment on the reprobate, he would spare the innocent, whom in his mercie hee had preserved from daunger; otherwise they should be more miserable and condemned by a harder censure, if they were not wholly warranted, but should be reserved to be swallowed vp by another Deluge; and hauing suffered the feare and sight of the first, to perish by the second. Hee praised him therefore that hee would bee pleased to accept of his sacrifice, and in his mercy vouchsafe that he would hereafter conceiue no more any so hainous hate and displeasure against the earth, to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities might possess the same in peace, wanting none of those commodities which they enioyed before the Deluge: but that they might equall their forefathers in olde yeares, and length of life.

Noe hauing in this sort finished his requestes, God (who loued him for the vprightnes of his heart) granted him his request, denying himselfe to bee the author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themselves by their owne malice had procured those punishments due vnto them. For had he desired that they should bee extinguished, hee would not haue brought them into the world. For better is it, not to grant life; then to destroy those to whome thou hast giuen it. But (saith God) thorow their contempt of my seruice and graces, they haue enforced me to humble them vnder the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so exactly pursue and examine their iniquities to the end to chastice them in my displeasure; especially for thy sake; And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, feare not (how huge and hideous soeuer the stormes be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water vpon the earth. In the meane time I command you to keepe your hands innocent from murders, and all manslaughter, and to punish those that commit wickednes. I leaue the vse of all other liuing creatures to your sustenance or seruice; in as much as I haue made you Lord ouer all, as well those that breath vpon the face of the earth, as those that swimme in the waters, and such as inhabite and flye amidst the ayre: but you shall not eat any bloud, in as much as therein consisteth the soule and life of liuing creatures. And I declare vnto you that I will desist to draw the shafts of my displeasure against men. And I will giue you the rainbow for a signe: for this bowe in their opinion is the bowe of God. And after that God had pronounced these words and made these promises, he departed.

Noe liued after the Deluge three hundred and fiftie yeares, and hauing spent all this time of his life in happines, hee died after he had liued in the world nine hundred and fiftie yeares. Neither is there cause why any man (comparing this our present age, and the shortnes of the yeares thereof, with the long life of the auncients) should think that false which I haue said: neither followeth it consequently, that because our present life extendeth not to such a terme and continuance of yeares, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age & long life which we publish of them. For they being beloued of God, and newly created by him, vsing also a kinde of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their yeares, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their yeares were of that continuance: Considering that God gaue them long life, to the end they should teach vertue, and should conueniently practise those things which they had inuented in Astronomie, and by Geometry: the demonstrations whereof they neuer had attained, except they had liued at the least fixe hundred yeares. For the great yeare is accomplished by that number of yeares: whereof all they beare me witnesse, who (eyther Greekes or Barbarians) haue written auncient histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the historie of Aegypt) & Berosus (who hath registred the acts and assayres of the Chaldeans) together with Mochus Hestianus, Hierome of Aegypt who historified the state of the Phanicians with others accord with me in that which I haue said. Hesiodus also, Heccatæus, Hellanicus, & Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolans do declare; that they of the first world liued one thousand yeares. Notwithstanding let euery man iudge of these things, as best liketh him.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

Noe had three sons, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, borne one hundred yeeres before the Deluge. These first descended from the mountaines into the plaines, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceiued (who for feare of the Deluge had fled the plaines, and for that cause were loth to forsake the mountaines) they gathered courage & perswaded themselves to do the like: and the plaine where they all dwelt was called Senaar. And whereas they were commanded by God that (by reason of the increase and multitude of men) they should send certaine distinct Colonies to inhabite diuers countries of the world (to the end that no seditions might grow betwixt the one and the other; but contrariwise in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great store of fruit) they were so ignorant that they disobeyed God, and falling into great calamities suffered the punishment of their offences. For, whereas they flourished in increase (by reason of the great number of their youth) God counsellèd them again that they should diuide themselves into colonies. But, they (thinking that the goods which they possessed proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but presuming that their force was the only cause of their abundance) did not obey him, but rather suspected that God sought to betray them, to the end that being thus diuided he might the better subdue them: Nemrod incited them in this sort to mocke and contemne God. He was the nephew of Cham, the sonne of Noe; a man valiant and apt for arms: hee put them in the head that they should not beleue that their good hap proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their owne vertue, which furnished them with so much riches: so that in a little space he reduced the estate to a tyrannie; supposing by this only meanes that he might make men reuolt against God, if he might perswade them to submit themselves to his gouernment; giuing them to vnderstand, that if God should once more send a Deluge, he would take reuenge on him in mens behalf, and that he would build a tower, to whose top the water should not attempt, and reuenge the death of his predecessors. The common sort was ready to follow these ordinances of Nemrod, supposing it to be pusillanimity in themselves, if they should obey God. For which cause they began to build the tower with their vttermost industry, neither was there any one idle in all that worke: yea so great a number of labourers were there, that the worke was raised to a height beyond all expectation. The thicknes thereof was so great that it obscured the height thereof: and it was builded of burnt brick cimented & ioined with a bituminous mortar, to the end it should not receiue any cleft in the same.

But God seeing their madnesse, condemned them not to a generall extermination (by reason that they had made no profit by their example, who perished in the first Deluge) but made them mutine the one against the other by changing of their tongues; so that by reason of their diuersities of language, they could not vnderstand one another. The place where this tower was builded, is at this present called Babylon (by reason of the confusion of tongues that first began in that place) for Babell in Hebrew signifieth confusion. Of this tower and the diuersitie of languages Sibylla hath made mention in these words. At such time as men vsed one kinde of language, they builded a most high tower, as if they meant by the same to mount vp into heauen; but the gods sent downe winds and ouerthrew the tower, and gaue euery one his distinct and seuerall language, whence sprong the cause that their Citie was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Senaar in Babylon, Hestians testifieth after this manner. It is sayde of those sacrificers, that being escaped, they took the sacred reliques of Iupiter Engelins, and came into Senaar in Babylon.

CHAP. VI.

How Noes posterity disperst themselves thorow the whole world.

From that time forward (by reason of the diuersitie of tongues) they disperst themselves into diuers countries, and planted colonies in all places; and occupied those places whither eyther God or their good fortune had conducted them: so that both the Sea coastes, and the middle-land were replenished with inhabitants. Some there were also who pasing the sea in ships and vessels, first peopled the Islands. And there are some nations likewise, who at this day retaine the names which in times past were imposed on them: some other haue

 They have changed them. Others are altered into a more familiar and knowne name, to neighbors, deriving them from the Greekes the authors of such Titles. For they in these latter times haue growne to great name and power, haue appropriated the auncient glorie to themselves, in giuing names vnto Nations deriued from the Greekes, and policying them, as if they had taken their originall from them.

NOW they in honour of whom the Nations receiued their first names, were the children of the sonnes of Noe. Iaphet the son of Noe had seven children who began to make their abode from the mountaines of Taurus and Amanus, and entered Asia, euen vnto Tanna, and Europa, vnto Gades, occupying the countrey which they first mettewith, and vvas not before time by man inhabited, each one calling his seuerall Nation by his owne name: for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians, Magog dwelt amongst those, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greekes Scithes. Of Madus (the first begotten sonne of Iaphet) issued the Madians, whom the Greekes haue named Medes; and of Iavan his other sonne, the Ionians & Greekes tooke their originall: Thobelus gaue name likewise to the Theobelians, vvhich at this day are called Iberians. Mefchus was the author of them that were called Mefchates, who are lately named Capadocians: for they shevv euen at this day a token of their auncient name, to vvhich the Citie of Mafaca, which testifieth to those that conceiue the same, that this Nation hath been so called. Theres named them Therians, vvhich were vnder his gouernment, whom the Greekes called Thracians: and thus many nations tooke their originall from the sonnes of Iaphet: but of the three sonnes which Gomar had Afchanaxes gaue originall to the Alchanaxians (at this day termed Rhegiens by the Greekes) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhiphatians, called at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greekes are called Phrigians. As touching Iauan the sonne of Iaphet, hee had three sonnes, of vvhom Abisus gaue name to the Abisians, who at this present are the Aetolians, ouer vvhom he commanded: Tharus ingendred the Tharrians, vvhich was the auncient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane Citie Tharsis; vvhose first letter is Θ in steede of Th. Chetinus obtained the Isle of Chetina, called at this day Cipris (whence it happeneth that not onely all the Islands, but also diuers other places on the sea coast are by the Hebrewes called by this word Cethim) vvhich was one of the Cities of Cipris vvhich hath had the reputation to conserue her auncient name. For it is called Citium, by those that vvest the same to the Greekes sense, a word not verie much varying from Cethim. These Nations were occupied by the sonnes and yong children of Iaphet. But I will first publish that which perhaps is vnknowne to the Greekes, and then prosecute my purposed narration vvhich I haue omitted, that is, that these names are formed after the manner of the Greekes, to the ende they should bee more sweet and pleasant to them that should ouer-read them. For this termination is not proper to our Nation, which hath but one forme, and no variation of termination: for vvhich the Greekes pronounce Αδამος we say Adam; and where they say Noches, the Hebrewes say Noe, and keepe this termination in all things.

But the sonnes of Cham possessed Syria and all the region that abutteth on the mountaines of Amanus and Libanus; extruding their Emphyre towards the sea, and signiorising all vvhich euen vnto the sea. Whose names are partly vvholly abolished, and partly chaunged, and applied to others; so as they are verie hard to be vnderstood: for of the foure sonnes of Cham, the name of Chus hath not beene chaunged by time: for the Aegyptians (ouer whom they extended their Dominion) haue heene named Chuscans by them, and by all the Asians: the name of Misraim hath continued also in the memorie of men: for we that bound vpon Aegypt, call that countrey, the countrey of Misraim, and the Aethiopians, Misramites. Phut likewise firmed the colonies of Libia, and called the inhabitants thereof according to his name Phutians; and there is a riuier in the countrey of Mauritania which hath the same name, of which it is most manifest that diuers Greeke Histories make mention, as also of the countrey neere adioyning, vvhich they call the countrey of Phut, but it hath chaunged his present name by the meanes of one Libis one of the sonnes of Misraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter signifie vnto you). As touching Canaan the fourth sonne of Cham, he dwelled in the countrey at this day called Iudaea, and called it the countrey of Canaan according to his name. They also had children:

Adren: for Chus had sixe) amongst whom Sabaz established the Sabians, and Enilus the Euileans. The year of the world, 1790. before the Deluge. Sabathes engendred the Sabatheans, whom the Greekes name Asstracrabians. Sabathes peopled the Sabatians: and the Romans were founded by Romulus who also had two sonnes, of whom Indas dwelt in the countrey of the Indians; amongst those that are called Heperians in Ethiopia, and Sabans founded the Sabians.

Nimrod the sonne of Chus, settled his Colony vpon the confines of Babylon, and tyrannized there as heretofore I haue declared.

All the eight sonnes of Misraim, occupied all the countrey from Gaza vnto Egypt: Only the countrey where Philistins gouerned, hath conserued his name: for the Greekes call Palestine a part thereof. As touching the rest, Lom, Enam, and Labim (who only inhabited Libia and called the countrey by his name) likewise as touching Nethom, Phetrosim, Chreseen and Chephom, we know neither of their countries, nor of their names. For, the Ethiopian war (whereof herafter we will make mention) hath ouerthrowne their Cities. Chanaan also had sonnes, amongst whom Sidonius builded and named Sidon (a citie in Phenicia) and Amathus builded Amate, which at this day the inhabitants call Amathia: but the Macedonians haue named it Epiphania (which is as much to say as famous) by reason of some that defended from Epiphanes. Arudeus possessed the Isles of Aradus, and Aracrus builded the Citie of Arce, situate in Libanus. And as touching the other seven, the Eueans, Chetrians, Iebusians, Eudians, Semarians, Samaritians, and Gergesians; there is no memory remaining in sacred scriptures but only their names: for the Hebrewes rated their Cities vpon these occasions.

After the Deluge, when the earth was established in his former estate, Noe gaue himselfe to tillage, and planted vineyards, and when the fruit thereof was ripe (and he had pressed and made wine thereof) he dranke and banqueted after he had done sacrifice: Being thereby made drunk, and ouerpresse with sleepe, hee lay discovered in a most vnseemely and shamefull fashion; which when his younger sonne beheld, he scornfully discovered it to his brothers: who being ashamed, covered their Fathers shame with reuerence. Which fact of his, comming at last to light, and the knowledge of Noe, hee wished all felicity to the two other, and as touching Cham (by reason he was his ally in bloud) he cursed him not, but his posterity after him. But although the others escaped this malediction, yet God inflicted it on the successors of Chanaan, whereof we will speake more hereafter. But Sem the third sonne of Noe had five sonnes, who inhabited the countrey of Asia, beginning at Euphrates, and extending to the Indian Ocean sea. For Elymis left the Elemians or Elamites for his successors, whence proceeded the Perlians. Assur made his abode in Niniue, and imposed on his subiects the name of Assyrians (who were rich amongst all the rest). Arphaxad named those of his command Arphaxadians, (whom the Greekes called Syrians) this day are called Chaldeans. Aram had the Arameans (whom the Greekes called Syrians) and they that are now called Lidi, and in times past Ludi tooke their descent from Ludas. Of those foure sonnes which Aram had, Vses dwelt in Trachonite; and in the countrey of Damasco (situate betweene Palestine and Syria, surnamed Caen or hallow.) Otrus obtained Armenia: Gether Bactria. Misas was father to the Misurians (who dwelt in a fort which is called at this day Prasine). Sali, Arphaxad's sonne was Hebers father, by whose name in times past the Hebrewes were called: Leber begat Loftan and Phaleg, who was so called, for that he was borne at such time as the land was parted: for Phaleg in Hebrew signifieth partage. They that follow were sonnes of Loftan: Elmodad, Saleph, Azeremeth, Eraus, Edoram, Vzalus, Dallis, Ebal, Etimarl, Saphas, Ophir, Enilus, and Iobel: who occupied some parcell of that which was about Cophen a riuier of India, and the hither Syria. Hitherto haue we spoken of the progenie of Sem, herafter will I speake of the Hebrewes, of Phaleg the sonne of Heber Ragaus, by vvhom vvas begot Seruch, whence Nachor is descended, and of Nachor, Thares, vvhich vvas Abrahams father, the tenth in accompt from Noe, and borne in the yeere 292. after the Deluge. For, Thares being seventy yeeres olde begat Abraham. Nachor at sixe score yeeres of his age, begat Thares. Nachor vvas borne to Seruch, vvhich he vvas about the yeeres of 132. of his life. And Ragaus begat Seruch when he vvas thirty two yeeres olde, and about those yeeres Phaleg begat Ragaus. But Heber in the 34. yeere of his age, begat Phaleg: (himselfe begotten by Sela, when he vvas one hundredth of thirty and five yeeres olde) vvhich Sela vvas begotten by Arphaxad, vvhich he vvas 135. yeeres of age. And Arphaxad vvas the son of Sem, vvhich hee begat some two yeeres after the Deluge. Arphaxad had two brothers, Nachor and Aram, of vvhom Aram left Lot for his sonne, and Sara and Melcha for his daughters, and afterwards died in the land of Canaan in a City called Vr; of the Chaldies, vvhich his sepulchre is to be seene euen at this day. His daughters were married, Melcha

How ABRAHAM the Author of our nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certaine countrey of the Chanaanites, which is now called I V D E A.

13 Abraham hauing no issue, adopted Lot the sonne of Aram his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: he departed out of the country of the Chaldeis, when he was 75. yeeres old (hauing had commandement from God to depart thence in to Canaan) in which country he remained, and left the same to his posterity after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of vnderstanding, and apt to perswade those that gaue eare vnto him, without any defaulte in his foresight and prouidence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first vndertook to conuince the receiued and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deitie. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, & prooue, that there was but one God, gouernour and maker of all things, and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicitie, it happened vnto vs not by our owne workings, but his holy will. And this obserued and approued he by that, which chaunceth both in the earth and the sea, as also those things, which he sawe daily occurre by the influences of the sunne, the moone, and other starres: namely, that there was a certaine power that disposed them, and decently administred all things, without whose assistance, nothing would bee profitable vnto vs; whereas nothing of himselfe hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiuing should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and countsailes of his (seeing the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that country, and following the will and fauour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an altar and sacrificed vnto God.
Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our father Abraham, although hee nameth him not, when he speaketh after this manner. After the Deluge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most iust, excellent, and vpright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestiaall bodies. But Hecateus made more then a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath written of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, heare what he saith of him in the fourth booke of his Histories. Abraham raigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arrived with his army from a country situate aboue Babylon called Chaldaa, L who a little while after (departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a country at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Iudaa, and his posteritie multiplied therein. In an other treatise I will recite that which is reported of him. The name of Abraham cuen at this day, is honourable in the country of Damasco, and there is a village to be seene which beareth his name, and is called Abrahams house.

14 After this (when famine had inuaded the land of Chanaan, Abraham had intelligence that the Egyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himselfe to retire himselfe towards them: as well to conferre with their Priests (and discourse with them of diuine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in vnderstanding, or reconcile them, if his iudgement were more assured then theirs. He

A men (to the ende the king should not put him to death, of purpose that he might enioy his wife Sara, who was very beautifull) he deuised this excuse to say that shee was his sister, charging her that if the matter came in question, she should not faile but confirme the like. But no sooner came he into Aegypt, but the like fortune encountered them, as Abraham had before time suspected: for the beautie of his wife was sodainly published in euerie place. For which cause Pharao the King of that Nation (desirous to see that with his eies, the which he had heard with his eares) he sought for, sent, and lusted after her: but God withstood this his vnbridled lust by afflicting the Kings subiects with a plague, and his sayres by sedition. Whereupon taking counsell of the Priests what remedie might be vied, and meanes might be sought to appease the diuine maiesty, they answered him, that this was the cause of their afflictions, for that he thought to haue done violence to the strangers wife: whereat being much affrighted, the King first questioneth with the woman what she was, and who her companion should be? and at last resolu'd of the truerh, he satisfied Abraham, saying, he supposed her to bee his sister, not his wife, and that his purpose was not to offer iniury but seeke alliance: so giuing him a great summe of money, he gaue him leaue to conferre with the most excellentest & learnedest Priests among the Egyptians. Whence it came to passe, that he grew into great estimation in regard of his vertues: for whereas that Nation was diuided into different sects and opinions, and thorow mutuall contentpt & diuision were incensed the one against the other; hee declared that their opinions (different and confuted by themselves) in respect of religion, were most vaine and deuoid of all truerh. For these his dis-putations he was held in great regard among them, and esteemed for a man most wise, and a personage most excellent; not onely in well conceiuing, but also in expressing and perswading that which he vndertooke to teach: to these most graciously imparted he the science of Arithmetike, and the obseruation of the celestiaall bodies. For before that Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of those sciences: but hee transported them from Chaldaea into Aegypt, and from thence are they deriued to the Greeks. As soone as he returned into Chanaan, he diuided the country with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their shepherds (as touching the bounding of those pastures where they fed their cattell) he gaue Lot the choise and election of the country which best pleased him, retaining vnto himselfe that which was left.
 Thus pitching his tents neere the mountaine in a Citie called Hebron (which is by seuen yeeres more auncient then Tanis in Aegypt) he dwelled there. But Lot chose the Plaine neere to the flood of Iordane, not farre from Sodome; which in those daies was a goodly Citie, but at this present by the diuine iustice and wrath of God is vtterly defaced; so that no memorie remaineth thereof. The causes of which iudgement shall bee exprest hereafter.

The ouerthrow of the Sodomites by the Syrians.

15 That time when the Assyrians were Lords ouer all Asia, the estate of Sodome flourished in all affluence, increased in great riches, and multitude of gallant youthes, and the country was gouerned by fise Kings: these were Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symobo- rus and Balin (each one particularly seised of his prouince and kingdome.) Against these the Assyrians incamped themselves, and hauing diuided their armie into foure parts (vnder the conduct of foure gouernours) they waged battell with them; in which the Assyrians attayning the day, they imposed a tribute on the Kings of Sodome; who (after they had for twelue yeeres space performed their duety and paid their tribute) in the thirteenth yeere reuolted from them.
 Whereby it came to passe that the Assyrians leued a new armie against them, vnder the conduct and commaund of Marphad, Arioch, Chodollogomar, & Thargal, who sacked all Syria, and extinguished the posteritie of the Giants. And drawing neere to Sodome, they incamped neere to the bituminous pits (for at that time their were pits in that place) but as soone as Sodome was destroyed, there arose a lake in that place, which (by reason of the bituminous matter that flowed in the same) was called Asphaltites, that is to say, bituminous: of this lake hereafter wee will speake somewhat. But the Sodomites encountering with the Assyrians, there was a dangerous skirmish fought, wherein many perished on both sides; and the rest were either slaine or taken; amongst whom was Lot led away captiue, who came thither to asist the Sodomites.

CHAP.

ABRAHAM pursueth the Assyrians, and returneth victorious.

Abraham hearing of these things, and moued, (both with the surprisall of his cosen Lot, as also with the slaughter of his friends and neighbours) presently addressed himselfe with all his followers to giue them succours: and such diligence shewed he in pursuite of them, that the fift night after he encountred the Assyrians neere to Dan, which is one of the sources of Iordaine.

Where surprisng them on the sodaine (vn suspected and disarmed) hee killed those that were asleepe without suspicion of his coming, and they that were not yet asleepe, and lay wallowing in their drunkennesse he easily defeated and put to flight, pursuing them in such sort, that the second day after he draue them all into Soba a Citie of Damasco: declaring hereby, that victorie consisteth not in the multitude of those that manage their armes, but rather in the courage of those that fight, and that a fewe generous hearts are more worth alwaies, then a faint-hearted multitude. For hee had not with him above three hundredth and eightene of his household seruants, and three of his friends, to defeat this huge armie; so that whatsoever they were that escaped out of this slaughter by flight, returned vnto their houses with ignominie.

As soone as Abraham had rescued those prisoners of Sodome which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot; he returned into his country, & met in his way with the King of Sodome (in a place called the Kings field) where also he was entertained by the King of Solyma called Melchisedech (which is as much to say as the iust King:) for in trueth he was no lesse; but was held worthy by reason of his iustice in all mens opinion to sacrifice as the high Priest of Almighty God. This Solyma in processe of time was called Ierusalem. This Melchisedech did friendly entertaine all the followers of Abraham, not suffering them to want any thing that was fit for their sustentance, but entertaining him also at his owne table he highly praised him, and sung due hymnes of praise to the great God, for that by his fauour he had vouchsafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other side presented him with the tenths of his spoiles: but the King of Sodome remitted all the pray that was taken, and onely required to be possessed of those Captiues which were of the country: which condition hee accepted not, answering that hee would receiue no profit of that pray, but that which hee must needly haue for the entertainment of his seruants.

Yet gaue he a portion vnto his friends who had succoured him, the first whereof was called Eshcol, and the two other Ennerus and Mambres. For this cause God praised Abraham saying; thou shalt not want the reward which is due vnto thee for thy valiant actes. To which he replied, and what good shall I reape of this recompence, if I haue not an heire to possesse it after my decease? for as yet hee had no issue. Then did God promise him a sonne, whose posteritie should be so multiplied, that they might in number equall the starres of heauen; which when he understood, he offered sacrifice vnto God, following that commaundement which hee had receiued: hee tooke therefore a Heifer of three yeares old, a Goat of three yeares, and a Ramme of three yeares, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon: all which he diuided in twaine as hee was commanded, the birds onely excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at such time as the fowles howered about to haue part of the bloud of those beastes which were sacrificed) hee receiued an Oracle, that tolde him that his progenie should haue euill neighbours in Aegypt for the space of foure hundredth yeares, and that after they had suffered an insupportable seruitude, they should at last obtaine the victorie ouer their enemies. And after that they had by strong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they should be Lords and possessors of their countries and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt neere to the Oake that was called Ogis, in the country of Chanaan neere to the Citie of Hebron. There being much grieved that his wife conceiued not, hee besought God to giue him an issue male: God commanded him to bee of good cheere in all things, and that being come from Mesopotamia vpon good occasions, he also should haue children. At that time

Sara by the commaundement of God caused one of hir handmaidens which was an Aegyptian borne to enter in vnto her husband, to the end he might haue issue by her; now Agar as soone as she perceiued that she had conceiued, began to contemne Sara, aspiring to principallitie, and supposing that her issue should succeed in the kingdom. For which cause Abraham deliuered her vnto his wife, to the end she should punish her: which the perceiuing, she decreed to flie, in that she was afraid of punishment; beseeching God to haue mercy on her: and as shee trauielled on her way thorow the desert, the Angell of God appeired vnto her, commanding her that she should

A retorne vnto her master and mistris, assuring her that if hereafter shee would be more modest, she should be better intreated; and how at that present shee was fallen into those miseries, by reason she had proudly and insolently behaued her selfe towards her Mistris. Telling her moreover that if she disobeyed God, and wandred any further, she should die the death: but that if she returned from whence she came, she should be the mother of a sonne, who should one day be king of that country where she then was.

To this commaundement of God Agar submitted herselfe with all obedience, and returning backe againe to her master and mistris, she obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Ismael, which is as much to say as; Heard of God, because God had heard the mothers prayers. Ismael was borne to Abraham when he was fourescore and six yeares old: but in the fourescore and nineteenth yeare of his age God appeared vnto him, and tolde him that hee should haue a sonne by Sara, charging him to call him Isaac; giuing him to vnderstand, that great nations and kings should issue from his loines, who by force of armes should conquer all the country of Chanaan, from Sidon euen vnto Aegypt. Commanding him, that his posteritie should be circumcised in their priuities, and that this circumcision should bee done the viij. day after their birth, by reason that he would not that Abrahams posteritie should be intermedled with other nations. But hereafter will I declare the cause of our circumcision. Abraham also asked counsell of God as touching Ismael, whether he should liue or no: who tolde him that he should flourish many yeares, and that he should become a father of many worthy nations. Then gaue Abraham thanks vnto God, and presently circumcised himselfe, his sonne Ismael, with all his family: and Ismael at that time was thirteene yeeres olde, but Abraham about fourescore and and nineteene yeeres of age.

CHAP. XII.

About that time the inhabitants of Sodome became immeasurably proude, by reason of their affluence, prosperitie, and great riches; and committed outrages against men, and impieties against God: in such manner as they had forgotten the benefites which they had receiued at his hands, hating strangers, and disdaining to conuerse the one with the other, but in disordinate and abhominable incests. Whereat God being displeased, hee decreed to punish their intolerable pride; to ruinate their City from the top to the bottome, and in such sort to make desolate their country, that from thence forward it should neither nourish plant, nor bring forth fruit. After that God had pronounced this sentence against the Sodomites; Abraham (as he late vnder the Oake at Mambres before the doore of his tent) behelde three Angels, and supposing them to bee men and strangers, hee arose and saluted them; and approaching neere vnto them, hee desired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condescended, hee commaunded his seruants to bake them bread of the finest flower, and hauing killed and roasted a calfe, hee set it before them (as they late vnder the Oake) supposing they would eate: but they inquired of him where Sara his wife was: to whom he answered that she was within in the tent. They told him then that they would returne againe; and that they should find her a mother. But when his wife smiled thereat, and said that it was impossible for her to beare children; especially in that herselfe was at that time 90. yeares olde, and her husband 100. they discovered themselves, and said they were Angels of God, and that they were sent one of them to assure him that he should haue a sonne; the other two to destroy the Sodomites. Which when Abraham heard, hee was sorie for the Sodomites, and arising, besought God that he would not destroy both the iust and the vniust together. To whom God gaue this answer, that there was not one iust man among the Sodomites, and that if hee might but find ten, hee would spare the citie from punishment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entred into Sodome: where no sooner were they arriued, but Lot inuited them to take their lodging in his house (for hee was a man much giuen to hospitalitie, and such a one as for bounty had bene Abrahams Scholler.) But the Sodomites perceiuing that those young men which were entred Lots house, were of excellent beautie, began to offer outrage and villany to their persons: notwithstanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themselves, and not to offer villanie to his guests, but in some sort to haue a respect to his house; telling them, that rather then they should continue in that intemperance, hee would giue them his daughters to vse at their pleasure. But hee preuailed nothing with them: whereupon God was in such wise provoked by their iniquitie, that he blinded their eyes: in such sort, as they could not finde the gate to enter into Lot's house, and condemned the Sodomites to a generall perdition. But Lot foremonished by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and tooke with him his wife and his two daughters, as yet unmarried (for his inbred husbands, although they were forewarned by him, consented & held him for a dotard). Then did God shoote his arrow vpon the Citie, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and declaring by the time fire all the countries round about; in such sort as it hath already bene declared by me in the History I wrote of the warres of the Iewes. But Lot's wife, as they retired thence, looking backe towards the Citie, and more curiously beholding the destruction thereof, contrary to the commandement of God, was transformed into a pillar of salt, which I haue seene: for it remaineth euen vntill this day. As touching Lot, he and his daughters fled & dwelt in a little countrey farre from the fire, which was called Zoar (which in hebrew signifieth little): In this place (which was voyd of men, and scant of victualls) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a solitary and poore life: and his daughters supposing that all mankind was extinguished vpon the earth, subtilly circumventing their father, they lay with him when he least suspected it: and the reason that drew the therunto was, for that they feared lest mankind should be utterly exterminated. By this their approachement, they bare him two sons: the elder Moab (which is as much to say as of my father) and this is he that was the father of the Moabites, which euen at this day are yet a great nation: and of the younger sister, came Ammon (which signifieth the sonne of Race or kind) and both these two nations inhabite the countrey of Coelosyria. In this sort departed Lot from the Sodomites.

As touching Abraham, he went and dwelt in Gerar, in the countrey of Palestine; leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his sisters, vsing the same subtiltie which before time hee had practiced for feare of the Egyptians: for hee feared Abimelech the King of that countrey, who surprised with the loue of Sara, would haue rauished her, had he not been hindred by a most grievous sicknesse, which God inflicted vpon him: so that being out of all hope of recouerie, at such time as he slept, there appeared vnto him a vision, which tolde him that hee should take heede least he offered any outrage to the strangers wife, who was come into his countrey: and after hee was somewhat recouered, he tolde his friends how God had sent him that sicknesse to warrant the right of the stranger, and to preserve his wife from violence; for that she was not his sister but his lawfull wife; willing Abraham thenceforward to be of good cheere, promising him that the honour of his wife was intiolate. This sayd, he dismissed Abraham by the counsaile of his friends; and tolde him that he needed not to suspect his wife, by reason shee had suffered no villany. Assuring him that God had care of her, and that he deliuered her in safetie to him (being to that end protected by his mighty power): and in confirmation thereof hee called God to record, and the womans conscience; vowing that hee would not haue required her, if hee had knowne shee had bene married: moreouer he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appease Gods wrath, which was kindled against him. And that if thenceforward he would stay with him, he should want nothing: or if he listed to depart, he promised him guides, and all other things, for which he came vnto him. Abraham answered him, that hee had in no sort dissembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife; but that shee was his brothers daughter, and that hee thought hee might not safely trauell thorough his countrey, except hee had vsed that subtiltie; avowing moreouer, that he had not been the cause of that sicknesse which had befallen him: but that he singularly affected his good, and was readie to abide with him.

Whereupon Abimelech imparted vnto him both lands and mony, and accorded to conuerse with him in all vprightnesse, and without offer of offence, and made a covenant and sware vnto him by a certaine pit which was called Berabe (that is to say, the pit of swearing or coucnant) which name that place retaineth vntill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a sonne by Sara his wife according as God had promised him; and hee called his name Isaac (which in the Hebrew tongue signifieth laughter) because Sara laughed at such time as God sayd vnto her shee should beare a sonne, hauing in her selfe no likelihood of conceiuing, by reason shee was stricken in yeeres. For at that time she was ninetie yeeres old, and Abraham one hundreth when the child was borne, and incontinently the eight day after was hee circumcised; which custome is yet continued amongst the Iewes, who circumcise on the eight day.

Of ISMAEL ABRAHAM'S sonne, and of the Arabians his posteritie.

BUT the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth year. For Ismael the author thereof, and Abraham's sonne by his concubine, was circumcised in the thirteenth year after hee was borne. Of which Ismael it behooueth we speake more exactly in this place. Sara loued Ismael (begotten on her seruant Agar) from the beginning, with no lesse affection then as if hee had bene her owne sonne, for hee was brought vp as Abraham's heire. But after she had brought forth Isaac, she thought it no more requisite that Ismael should be brought vp with her sonne, in that he was the elder, and for feare least after his fathers decease, he should offer his younger brother iniurie. She incited Abraham therefore to send both him and his mother to some other place: but at the first he gaue no care to Sara's request, thinking it to be more then barbarous crueltie, to driue away a tender childe and his mother, destitute of all necessities. At length by the commandement of God hee listned to his wiues counsaile, and committed the child vnto his mother (being of himselfe as yet vnapt to traue) and giuing them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to goe thither, whither their necessitie should driue them. And when their victualls failed them, and their water was consumed, shee laide the childe beeing faint and wake vnder an Oake; and to the end that in her presence he should not breath his last, she went far away from him. At that time an Angell of God appeared vnto her, shewing her a fountaine hard by that place, and charging her to looke to the carefull education of her childe: because that by the conseruation of Ismael, she was to expect great happinesse. Vpon these promises she tooke comfort, and falling into the company of shepherds, shee by their bountie escaped from milery.

Afterwards, when hee attained mans estate, hee married a wife of the nation of the Egyptians (from whence his mother had her originall) by whom Ismael had twelue sonnes: namely, Nabaioth, Cedarus, Abdeel, Edumas, Massamus, Memasus, Masmesus, Chodamus, Themanus, Ieturus, Naphasus, Calmasus (all which inhabite the lands which are betweene Euphrates and the red sea; the name of which countrey is Nabathæa. These are they that began and made famous the nation of the Arabians, as well in respect of their prowesse, as also in respect of the dignitie of Abraham.)

AS touching Isaac, Abraham loued him with an intire and fatherly affection; as his onely begotten sonne engendred in his age by the bountie of God. The childe also adding himselfe vnto all vertue, carefull to honour his father and mother, and studious of the seruice of God, inuited both his parents the rather to affect and loue him. So that Abraham was very desirous to forsake this present life: provided, that he might leaue behind him all the goods which hee had, vnto his sonne; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (vnder triall and conformitie of his faith) God appeared vnto him, and reckoned vp all the benefits which hee had bestowed on him, how he had granted him victorie ouer his enemies and how (he had established and blest him with present felicitie by his fauour) for which cause hee required him to sacrifice and make an oblation vnto him of his sonne Isaac, commanding him that he should conduct him to the mountaine of Mora, and there to sacrifice him. In doing whereof, he should manifest the desire hee had to serue him (in preferring that which was agreeable to God before the life of his sonne). Abraham supposing that it was no waies lawfull to disobey God, but that he ought to submit himselfe to his will, as to him by whose prouidence all things had their being) said nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his sonne.

Moreouer, he made it knowne to no one of his household seruants, because (as he supposed) they might haue hindered him from the seruice of God. Hee therefore tooke his sonne Isaac with two seruants (loading an Asse with such things as were requisite for sacrifice) and traualled towards the mountaine, his seruants attending him for two daies space; and on the third daie following, as soone as hee perceiued the mountaine, hee left the rest of those that accompanied him in the Plaine, and attended onely by his sonne and himselfe, he came vp vnto the mountaine.

taine (vpon which afterwards king Dauid appointed that the Temple should be builded.) They carried with them also the rest of those things which were requisite for sacrifice (saue onely the beaust that was to be offered) now about this time, Isaac was five and twentie yeares old, and did himselfe prepare the Altar, and inquired of his father what he should offer, considering that as yet they had no sheep for sacrifice. Abraham answered him, that God would furnish them with what was of power sufficient, to giue men that in abundance whereof they had need, and to desire them of that they had, and whereof they helde themselves thoroughly possessed, and that it was hee would giue them wherewith to sacrifice (if it should please him to shew himselfe fauourable, and propitious to that sacrifice of his); now as soone as the Altar was made ready, and the wood prepared and laid vpon the same, and all things were in a readines, hee addrest his speech vnto his sonne and said thus.

My sonne, I haue oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that hee should giue thee life, by my infinite intercessions and prayers, and euer since thou wert borne into this world, I haue intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither haue I thought that in any thing I might be made more happie, then that departing out of this world, I might see thee at mans estate, and leaue thee the heyre and Lord of all my substance: but since it hath pleased God, that I should be thy father, and that the same God likewise now thinketh good that I should forsake thee, put vpon thee a constant mind, and take in good part that thus thou must be sacrificed: for in so doing I fulfill the commandments of God, who requireth at our handes that wee doe him this honour, for the fauours which hee hath bestowed vpon me, in assisting me, and in familiar manner conuersing and associating me both in warre and peace. Since therefore that being borne, thou art to die, (not after the accustomed manner of the liuing) but being offered in sacrifice by thine owne father, to the generall father, God: I deeme it reasonable, that since it seemeth good vnto him that thou depart out of this life (not by sickness, nor by warre, nor by any other inconuenience, that naturally happeneth vnto men) that it is behoofefull also that thou render thy soule vnto him in the midst of prayers, and the celebration of this sacrifice, to the end hee may receiue and feate thee neere himselfe: Thou shalt be my purueyor and stay of mine age (which is the cause for which I haue nourished thee, if thou leaue mee God for my purueyor and comfort in thy place. Then Isaac with a noble heart (like the gracious sonne of Godly a father) heard all that which his father said with great contentment, and answered that he would rather neuer haue beene borne, then that hee should once neglect the ordinance of God and of his father: or shew himselfe negligent to submit his will to both their pleasures, considering that if his father onely should command the same, he should doe very euill if hee disobeyed him: which said, he marched towards the Altar, and offered himselfe to the slaughter: which had surely happened at that instant, if God had not regarded him: for with loud voice hee called Abraham by his name, commanding him that hee should not kill his sonne, auerring that hee had not giuen him that commandment, because hee tooke pleasure in humane blood, neither for that by such impiety hee would deprive them of that sonne, of whome it was his pleasure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to proue his affection, to see whether being commanded such a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made triall of his faith and readinesse, and his vnspokeable pietie, hee did not repent him of that good hee had done vnto him: that the time should neuer be wherein hee would forget to haue care of him, and his race, whensoever he should pray vnto him, and that when the course of his yeares were happily ouerpast, hee should leaue a great signiory to those of his children, which should bee good and legitimate. He tolde him moreover, that he would multiply the race in diuers Nations, and that he would bestowe great benefits vpon them, and that the memorie of the chiefe of his offspring should bee euertasting, and that when they had gotten the countrey of Chanaan by armes, they should be enuied by all men for their greatnesse. After that God had spoken after this manner, it pleased him on the sodaine (no man knoweth how) to cause a Ramme to be seene, & found thereabouts for the sacrifice. And thus (being deliuered from all euills and inconueniences beyonde their expectations, after they had heard so many promises of so many blessings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the sacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in safety, and past the remnant of their liues in happinesse, God giuing them his blessing in whatsoeuer they vndertooke.

The death of SARA: ABRAHAM's wife.

Or long time after this, Sara died, after shee had liued one hundred twenty and seven yeares, and was buried in Hebron: (for the Chanaanites freely offered them free buriall) yet Abraham chose rather to buy a place to burie in, of Ephron a certaine Citizen of Hebron, for foure hundred sicles, where the monuments both of him and his posteritie are builded.

How the Nation of the Troglodytes came of CHETURA The wife of ABRAHAM.

After this, Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had sixe children, strong in trauell, and excellent in wisdom, namely Zambranes, Isar, Madar, Madian, Lonsabac, Suus, who likewise had sonnes; Suus had Sabacan and Dadan. Of Dadan issued Latusmus, Afusinus, Lurres. The children of Madan were Ephra, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldas. Of all these children & their successors Abraham gathered and established the Colonies which possessed the countrey of the Troglodytes, and all the countrey of Arabia the happy, whose confines extend euen vnto the red sea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libia & possessed the same: & that his successors (making their abode in that countrey) called it by the name of Africa. And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhistor who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the Prophet who is also called Malchus, and hath written the acts of the Iewes (according as Moses their law-maker hath compiled the same in writing) saith, that of Chetura there were diuers children born vnto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit Apher, Sarim and Iapher, and that of Sarem the Assyrians tooke their name: of the two others Apher and Iapher, the Citie of Affricke and the countrey of Africa take their names. That they warred with Hercules against Libya and Antens, and how Hercules hauing taken Ophra his daughter to his wife, had begotten of her Dedor who was father to Sophen, from whom those Barbarians that are called Saphaces haue taken their name.

But Abraham knowing that he should prouide a wife for Isaac his sonne, being almost forty yeares old, sent the oldest seruant of his family to betrothe and intreat for Rebecca the daughter of the sonne of Nachor his brother for Isaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with great oathes (celebrated according to these Ceremonies, which were that laying their two hands one ore anothers thighe, they should call God to witnesse of their intent) hee sent also strange prelents vnto them; such as were seldome seene in those parts: hee then departing from him was long time vpon the way (because that in winter time it is troublesome to trauell through Mesopotamia, by reason of the deep bogs, and in summer for want of water) besides the robberies of the country, which strangers & traouellers could not possibly escape, except they stood vpon their guard, and had conuoy. Hereupon at length he arrived & entered a City called Curas, and being in the suburbs of the same, hee encountered with diuers damels that went to fetch water, whereupon he inwardly besought God, that if the marriage were pleasing in his sight, he might find Rebecca amongst them, for whose cause Abraham had sent him thither to require her in marriage for his sonne: and that he might know her by this signe, that asking all the rest for water, they should refuse him, and the only should satisfie him. Tormented and tossed with these thoughts, he approached the Well, & required those virgins that they would giue him drinke, which they denied him, saying that they could not get water but with great labour, which they must beare into their houses, and not laushly bestow on others: whereupon one amongst them reproued the rest for that discourtesie, which they vsed towards the stranger; saying that they had neuer been conuersant amongst men, that refused to giue him water that requested it, wherupon she gaue him drinke with an amiable countenance: and he conceiuing good hope of all his businessse, yet being further desirous to know the euent of the matter, he praised the honesty and courtesie of Rebecca who had not refused to trauell in her owne person to satisfie his necessitie, asking her of what parents she was, learning them happy that had such a daughter, praying God that it might please him to grant them the good hap to marrie her to their contentment, and march her with a man of honest reputation, by whom she might be plentifull in good and lawfull children: Rebecca made no difficulty to tell him the names of her Parents, (the better to gratifie him) neither concealed she her owne name, but answered in this sort. I am called, sayd she, Rebecca, my father was named Ba- thuel, who is long since dead. Laban is our brother, who together with my mother hath care of all our family, and hath the charge and protection of my virginity. Which when he vnderstood he reioiced at al that which had happened vnto him, and was comforted with those things which he had heard, perceiving manifestly how God had prospered his journey. Whereupon drawing out a Jewell (with certain other ornaments, such as virgins take delight to wear) he offered them vnto the maide, telling her that he gaue her these presents in requittall of that kinde of service which she had offered him in satisfying his thirst, for that she amongst so many other virgins had only lawd her selfe affable and gracious; requiring her that hee might be entertained in her brothers house (by reason that night had depriued him of the means from travelling any further) & that he was charged with certainiewels of an espoused of great price, which in no place (as he said) might be in more safety then in their custody, whom in effect he had found so courteous & honest, assuring her that the vertue which appeared in her, gaue him sufficient testimony both of the curtesie of her mother and brother, who would not (as he supposed) take it in ill part if he were entertained: to conclude, that he would in no waies be chargeable vnto them, but would pay for his lodging and expences.

To this Rebecca answered, that he had reason to conceiue a good opinion of her Parents humanity, but yet did in some sort preiudice them in suspecting their liberality, assuring him that his entertainment should in no sort be mercenary but voluntary, and free & according to their affection. Yet first (said she) I will certifie my brother Laban hereof, and afterwards guide and intertaine you in our house: which done, she conducted him into their tent, commanding her brother Labans seruants to take care of his Camels, as for himselfe she entertained and feasted him at her brother Labans table.

When supper was past, he spake both to the brother and mother of the virgin after this manner. Abraham the sonne of Thares is your cousen. For, Nether (good mistris) the grand-father of your children was Abrahams brother of one and the same father and mother. He now sendeth me vnto you, requiring you to giue this Damsell for wife to his legitimate and only sonne, educated & brought vp to be heire of all his substance: whom although he might haue matcht with the richest maidens of his countrey, yet hath he refused all of them, desiring rather to impart this honour to one of his kindred and nation: set not light therefore his good affection and desire. For, besides all other blessings and good fortunes, which haue happily befallen mee in this my journey, I haue by Gods especiall prouidence, found out both the maid, and your house. For, I be at such time as I drewe neere the City and beholding many virgins that went a watering, I besought God that I might light vpon this maiden, and he vouchsafed me my desire: Ratified therefore on your part this marriage contracted by Gods prouidence, and honour Abraham in granting your consent by this your daughters marriage, whom I am sent to request at your hands, with most intire affection. Now they in that they both allowed a thing so behoofefull, and perceiued also that it was conformable to the will of God, they sent their sister vnto him vnder the conditions demanded: and Isaac then married her at such time as he had the managing of Abrahams affaires, by reason that the other sonnes of Abraham were already departed to take possession of their Colonies.

CHAP. XVII.

Of ABRAHAMS death.

Few daies after this, Abraham deceased (a man full of vertue vntill his last end) and honoured by God (according to that intire loue he had to vertue) with great affection. All the daies of his life contained one hundredth seuentie and fise yeares, and he was buried in Hebron with his wife Sara, and by his sonnes Isaac and Ismael.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of ISAACS sonnes, ESAV & IACOB, and of their nativity and education.

After the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Isaacs wife) waxed bigge with childe, and the time of her reckoning being neere at hand, Isaac was fore troubled, and sought counsell at Gods hands: who answered him, that Rebecca should bring forth two twins, and that of those two sonnes, two nations should be deriued, both which should be called by their names, and that he who seemed to be the least of them, should growe to be the greatest: not long time after

After (according as God had foretold him) hee was brought a bed of two twinnes, the eldest of whom was very hairy from the top of the head vnto the sole of the foote: and at such time as he issued out of his mothers wombe, his younger brother held him by the heele: the Father used the elder, who was called Esau, and Seir by reason of his haire; (which the Hebrewes will say in their language) but the younger who was called Jacob, was decreely beloued by his mother.

Now for that a great famine mighed in that countrey, Isaac (having resolved to retire himselfe to Egypt, by reason of the abundance and plentie of that countrey) hee went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place king Abimelech receiued and entertained him (according to the lawe of hospitallitie, and the league of friendship which was betwixt Abraham his father and him.) In the beginning therefore, hee shewed vnto him great signes of friendship, but afterwards, the enuie he had conceiued, kindred him fro persuing in the same: for perceiving that God was fauourable vnto Isaac, and had an especiall care ouer him, hee drave him out of his countrey: but he perceiving well that enuie had altered him, and that Abimelech began to be charged, hee retired himselfe not farre from Gerar into a place called the Sinights, and as hee there digged to find out a watering, Abimelechs shepherds came and set vpon him, & hindered him in such sort as he could not finish his purpose: and for that he purposely teryed from them, they verely supposed they had gotten the victorie: Anon after, when hee began to digge in another place, other shepherds of Abimelech, outraged him anew, as at the first: for which cause he left this fountaine imperfect also, expecting with ripe iudgement a more conuenient opportunitie, which was afterwards offered him by reason that the King gaue him leave to digge; whereupon he laboured out a fountaine, and called it by the name of Rooboth, which signifieth large. And as touching the other two, he called the first of them Eison, which is as much to say as strife: and the other Sienna, which signifieth hostilitie.

Thus increased he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech supposing that his affluence would be many waies hurtfull vnto him, and remembering himselfe that he had not faithfully entertained friendship with him, but in some sort giuen occasion of suspicion, by meanes of some hard measure: fearing lest hereafter the iniuries fresh in memorie, should more distrust him then their old and auncient plighted friendship; and misdoubting his reuenge, hee repaired vnto him, and contracted a new league of amitie with him, leading with him one of his chiefest captaines, as an abiter betwene them, by whose meanes hee obtained whatsoeuer hee required: so courteous was Isaac, and so readie in memorie of his fathers olde couenant to forgive new iniuries. And so Abimelech hauing obtained his purpose, returned to his house. Esau one of the two sonnes of Isaac (whom the father especially loued aboue all the rest) hauing attained the age of fortie yeares, tooke to wiues Ada the daughter of Edom, and Alibama the daughter of Esebeon, two princes of the Chanaanites (and that of his owne authoritie, without his fathers aduise or priuities, who would not haue consented, had the matter bene remitted vnto him, because he held it inconuenient to mix and ioyne him, or his, in affinitie with any dwellers or inhabitants of the countrey.) This notwithstanding, he would not displease his sonne by commanding him to giue ouer his wiues: but determined with himselfe to concale and keepe the matter silent.

When Isaac was waxen olde and wholly depriued of his sight, he called for Esau his sonne and said vnto him: that although he had not any default or blindness in him, yet his age would hinder him to dooe that seruice, which hee both ought and wished to dooe: and therefore he willed him to goe on hunting, and that he should make readie some meate for him that hee might eat: and after his repast, he might pray vnto God that it would please him to be assistant vnto him all his life time, and be a comforter and aide vnto him: protesting moreover, that since he was vncertaine of the houre of his death, he thought good to blesse him, and by his prayers to procure Gods mercie towards him, before he slept with the dead. Herevpon Esau went on hunting: but Rebecca in the meane time (desirous that Isaacs blessing should light vpon her son Jacob) contrarie to her husbands intent and mind, commanded him to go, and kill two kiddes, and prepare a repast for his father. Jacob being obsequious and obedient to his mother in all things, fulfilled her command, and as soone as the meate was readie, hee wrapped his armes and couered his hands with the Goats skins, hoping by the hairines thereof, to make his father beleue that hee was Esau. For being his brother at one and the same birth, hee resembled him in all things except in this thing onely: but fearing lest hee should be surprised in his subtiltie before his father, Isaac had finished his prayers, and in stead of his blessings he might be loaden with his curses, hee presented the meat vnto his father. But Isaac perceiuing some alteration in his voyce, calleth his sonne, who stretching out his hands vnto him couered with the kids skinnnes, Thou art (saide he). more like vnto Jacob in thy voyce; but by thy hairnesse, thou seemest vnto me to be Esau. Thus suspecting no deceit, and hauing already eaten, hee addressed himselfe to pray, and called vpon God saying. O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou hast promised great blessings vnto my father, and hast giuen me many and present felicities, and hast vowed that thou wouldest be merciful vnto my posterity, and plentifully powre vpon them more & more ample benefites: let this thy fauour, I beseech thee, be continued towards me; neither despise thou mee by reason of this my present weaknesse, which is the cause that I haue more neede of thy help. Saue and keepe this my sonne by thy clemency, warrantize him from all euill, giue him a happie life, and possession of all blessings & benefites which are in thy power to bestow vpon him: make him feare his enemies, and gracious to his friends. Thus prayed he vnto God, thinking he had blessed Esau. Scarce had he finished his prayers, but Esau returned from hunting, which though Isaac perceived, he was no waies moued with displeasure, but held himselfe silent. Esau besought him that he might obtaine as much as he had vouchsafed his brother; but Isaac denied him, in that he had bestowed all his blessings vpon Jacob: for which cause Esau lamented and wept. His father (amazed and moued by his teares) foretold him that he should excell in hunting, in force of body, in arms, and other such exercises, whereby he should purchase immortal glory both to himselfe and his posterity, yet notwithstanding that he should be his brothers vassall. But for that Jacob feared least his brother should seek to be reuenged of him for robbing him of his fathers blessing, he was by his mothers means deliuered from this perill. For, the perswaded her husband to take Jacob a wife neere called vnto him, out of Mesopotamia. Esau at that time had married another wife called Basemath the daughter of Ismael: for neither Isaac nor his were well affectioned towards the Chanaanites: but were offended by reason of his former espousals. For, which cause Esau to giue them contentment married Basemath, whom afterward he loued more intirely then all the rest.

Gen. 28.

BVt Jacob being sent into Mesopotamia by his mother, vnder hope to marry the daughter of Laban, her brother (wherunto Isaac consented through the counsaile of his wife) passed through the country of Chanaan. And for that there was a conceiued & open hatred betwixt *Isaac*s people and the inhabitants of Chanaan, hee would not take vp his lodging amongst any of them, but lay abroad in the fields, resting his head vpon stones, which hee had heaped together in stead of a pillow: and during the time of his rest, this vision following was presented vnto him. It seemed vnto him that he saw a ladder, that extending it self from the earth, reached vp vnto heauen, along the steps whereof there descended certaine resemblances more excellent to look on, then the ordinary port of humane nature could impart; and on the top thereof God manifestly appeared, and calling him by his name, spake vnto him after this maner. Jacob, sure thou art the son of a good father, and descended from a grandfather renowned & famous for his great vertue: thou must not be daunted, or appauled by thy present trauels; but rather be confirmed in hope of future good hap. For by mine assistance thou shalt be blessed, and endowed with many benefites. For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the country of Mesopotamia, at such time as he was pursued by his parents: I haue also made thy father happy, and will be no lesse gracious and fauourable vnto thy selfe.

God speaketh vnto Jacob.

Be confident therefore, and prosecute thy iourney vnder mine assistance. The mariage which thou pursuest shall haue a happie issue, and thou shalt haue good children, who in number shall grow infinite, and shall likewise leaue after them a plentifull and famous posterity, and I will giue them the souerainety ouer this country, both to them and their successors, and they shall people and replenish both the earth and the Sea, as farre as the Sunne enlighteneth the world. Let not therefore any danger dismay thee, nor trouble discomfort thee: for besides all this, whatsoever thou shalt vnder take, I will not cease to assist thee. These things did God foretell vnto Jacob; who very highly reioicing at that which he had seene, and that which had bene denounced vnto him, annointed the stones on which the promises of so many blessings had bene made, and vowed to offer sacrifice vnto God on the same, if at such time as hee had attained the good hee sought, he should grant him the grace to returne in health and safetie into his country: which

As soone as hee returned backe hee performed, offering vnto God the tenth of all that which hee had giuen him. And as touching the place where this vision appeared vnto him hee hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greeke tongue signifieth the house of God. Continuing thus his journey into Mesopotamia hee trauelled so long, till at last hee arrived at Charran: and hauing met in the suburbs of the City with certaine shepherds and young men accompanied with young maidens, sitting neere to a certaine fountaine, he drew neere vnto them, desiring them to giue him drinke: and falling in discourse with them, hee asked them whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet aliue. All of them answered that they knew him well, and that he was a man of that reputation that his name could not bee concealed, that his daughter was accustomed to feede her flocke with them, and that they wondered that she was not as yet arrived: of whom (saide they) thou maist perfectly vnderstand all that which thou desirest to know. Whilest thus they past the time in talke, the Damsell drew neere accompanied with her shepherds: whom one of the company informed that Jacob was inquisitiue after her father; who, reioicing after the manner of young maidens, asked him what he was, and whence hee came, and what necessity had driuen him thither? wishing shee had the means to supply whatsoeuer his necessities required. Jacob being overcome, not by the force of affinitie, or by her good behaviour and curtesie, but with the loue of the maiden, was inflamed seeing her so faire and matchlesse in beauty, and layd vnto her. If thou art the daughter of Laban there is a greater and more auncient coniunction betwixt both thy father, thy selfe and me, then either thy yeares, or my birth can attaine vnto. For, Abraham, Aran and Nachor, were Thares sonnes; Bathuel thy grandfather was Nachors sonne, Isaac my father was the son of Abraham, and Sara daughter of Atam: there is yet a neerer and dearer bond of friendship wherewith we are linked one vnto another. For, Rebecca my mother is sister vnto Laban thy father, borne of one father and mother; so that you and I are colens: and therefore now am I come at this present to salute you, and renewe that auncient loue which our alliance requireth at our hands. But shee remembering her of all those things which her father was wont to report and discourse of Rebecca, and knowing that her Parents were desirous to heare some news from her, she wept for ioy, remembering her of the loue of her father, & hung about his necke, and embraced the young man, and after she had saluted him she said vnto him: Thou bringest a most desired & great pleasure to my father & all his family, who neuer forgetteth thy mother, but often times maketh mention of her: and would esteeme it a great felicity to heare tidings from her. Then desired she him presently to follow her to her father, least any longer he might be deprived of so desired a pleasure. This said, she brought him vnto Laban, where being acknowledged by his vncke, he both by that meanes liued securely amongst his friends, as also brought him great contentment, by his vnexpected access vnto them. Some few dayes after, this Laban told him that hee tooke so much contentment in his presence, that he could not expresse it in words, yet required hee him to manifest the cause that had induced him to leaue his father and mother in their extreame age, at such times as they had most neede of him, to find him out; moreouer he promised him all assistance and fauour in whatsoeuer case hee had to make vse of him. Whereupon Jacob discoursed vnto him the whole matter, that Isaac had two sonnes, himselfe and Esau, that his brother (in that by his mothers deuise and counsell, he had defrauded him of his fathers blessing) sought and desired to kill him, as he that was the rauisher of that principality from him that was destinated vnto him by God, and the surpriser of all his fathers other intended vovues: that this, as also his mothers command was the cause why he came thither: by reason they are all brothers, and by reason that in especiall his mother was their chiefe kinne; telling him that next after God hee hoped to finde his greatest assistance and helpe by the means of his vncke. Whereupon Laban promising vnto him whatsoeuer humanity hee could imagine (as well in respect of their common ancestors, as for the loue hee bare vnto his mother, towards whom although she were absent, he would expresse his good affection, in shewing himselfe well affected towards him that was there present) he told him then that hee would giue him the charge of his flocke; and make him master ouer all his shepherdes, and that when he should thinke good to returne backe againe to his friends, he should depart with such rewardes and honours as might well become a friend so neerely allied vnto him as he was. Which when Jacob vnderstood, he answered that he would willingly indure any sort of labour in Labans seruice, and that his deuoir towards him would be a delight to himselfe, but that in lieu of his labours he required Rachel to wife, who deferred to be honoured by him with no lesse title for many causes, but in especiall for that she had brought him thither: knowing that the loue which he bare vnto her was the cause why he used those speeches. Laban (being

But as Jacob traualled towards the countrey of Chanaan, he encountered many visions, which G prelaged vnto him good hope and fortunes to come; and he called the place where this thing happened, the Field of God. And being desirous to know how his brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to sound and gather the exact truth thereof; by re-
son he stood in feare lest the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signifie vnto Esau, that Jacob (deeming it to be a thing inconuenient to liue with his brother, who was displeased with him) had of his owne freewill forsaken the countrey, and that at this present he was vpon his returne, thinking that the length of time were sufficient to procure a reconciliation between them. He therefore led with him his wiues and children, with all those riches which God had given him; offering himselfe vnto Esau with all that of most esteeme which he had, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to him, to impart vnto his brother a part of those commodities, which he had receiued at Gods hands. All which they signified vnto Esau, who reioiced very much thereat, and went forth to meete his brother, accompanied with foure hundred armed men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meete him, attended by so many men at armes, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, least any detriment should happen vnto him, studying euery way to defend both him, and his, from inuasion. Whereupon diuiding his troupes, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow speedily after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselves to the troupe that followed.

After this maner hauing ordered all things about him, he sent certaine with presents to his brother, namely with beasts of charge, and a great number of diuers kinds of foure-footed beasts, (which for their rareness might worke more content and admiration in those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountered thus in rankes, they might seeme to be of greater number then they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might serue to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched formost, that they should vse courteous salutation towards Esau. Hauing thus all the day disposed his troupes, as soone as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the riuer of Iaboch: but Jacob, who was left hindmost, was encountered with a vision, in which he wrestled with an apparition, and hee became victor.

Now this vision spake vnto him, exhorting him to reioice at that which had hapned vnto him, assuring him that he had not achieved an easie matter, but that he had surmounted an Angell of God, which was a signe of great good which should befall him, and that his posteritie should be inuincible, and that neuer man whatsoever hee were, should overcome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say according to the Hebrewes, a resister of an Angell. These things were foretold vnto Jacob vpon his request, who perceiuing also that hee was an Angel of God, praised him to informe him of that which should happen vnto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Jacob tooke great pleasure thereat, and called the place Phanuel, that is to say, the face of God: and for that in wrestling he had hurt his broad nerue, hee afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our nation doe neuer feede thereon.

Now when he had intelligence that his brother neerly approched him, he commanded his wiues that they should march forward euery one with their handmaidens, to the end that they might from afarre behold the sight of the men, if so be that his brother should assaile them. But himselfe hee huddled in reuerencing his brother, who drew neere vnto him, without intent of circumcution; and Esau saluted him, and enquired of him as touching the companies of women and children; and after he vnderstood how all went, he was desirous to lead them to his father.
But Jacob excused himselfe, by reason of the wearines of his cattell, and Esau retired to Sair where he made his abode, and had imposed that name on that country, by reason of his thicke haire.
Jacob also retired himselfe to a place, which at this day also is called the Tents, and from thence into Sichem, a city of the Chanaanites.

Now at such time as the Sichemites celebrated their feast, Dina which was Jacobs only daughter, went into the City to see the brauery of the women of that country. But Sichem the sonne of King Emmor rauished her, and deflowred her: and being surprised with her loue, he besought his father that he might take her to wife, who listning thereunto, went vnto Jacob, praying him to ioine Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his sonne Sichem. Jacob not daring to contradict him by reason of his authority and quality; and on the other side, not thinking it to be

A be either a thing lawfull, or conuenient to match his daughter with a stranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to consult thereupon. Hereon the king departed, hoping that Jacob would listen to the marriage. But Jacob hauing discovered vnto his sonnes the truifment of their sister, and the request of Emmor, desired them to deliberate amongst themselves what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon some held their peace, not knowing what to say; but Simeon and Leui (the brothers of the same wombe, with their sister) conspired together this practise. In as much as it was a festiual, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleasure and banquetting, they issued by night vpon their first guards, and killed them that were a bed; and from thence entering into the Citie, they killed all the males (and with them the king and his son) but to the women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledge of their father, they brought their sister backe agayne. Jacob was very much astonished at this accident so strangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared vnto him and comforted him, and commanded him that he should purifie his tents, and accomplish those sacrifices which he had vowed to performe, at such time when first he went into Mesopotamia, and the vision appeared vnto him. Whilest then hee cleansed those which followed him, he found the Gods of Laban, which beside his knowledge Rachel had stolne, and hid them in Sichem in the earth vnder an Oake.

Afterwards departing from thence, he sacrificed in Bethel, where he had seen the vision, at such time as hee first of all tooke his journey into Mesopotamia: and as he traualled in the land of Ephrata, Rachel died in child-bed, and was buried there: (and she only hath not enioyed the honour, which is done in Hebron to those of her parentage.) After he had made great lamentation, he named the child which she bare at that time, Beniamin, (by reason of the dolours which happened vnto his mother.) These are all the children of Jacob, twelue males and one daughter, of whom eight were begotten on his lawfull wiues, fixe of Lea, and two of Rachel; and on their chamber-maides, foure; two of each of them, whose names I haue heretofore recorded. From thence went Jacob to Hebron a Citie of Chanaan, where Isaac made his abode, and they liued but a small time together, because Rachel was dead and departed from him.

dreams.

BVt Jacob attained to that felicity, that scarcely any other had beene so happy; for hee surpassed all the inhabitants of that country in riches: and by reason of the vertues of his children, hee was both enuied and regarded. For, they were accomplished in all perfections, animared and endowed with stout hearts; prepared to execute any work of the hand, and to indure all sorts of trauel: finally, all of them were furnished with knowledge and prouidence. But God had such care of him, and so diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which seemed vnto him to bee griefefull and contrary, hee broughtro an issue prosperous for him, and increasefull for his riches: and brought to passe, that both he and his children were the first motiue to our auncestours to forsake the land of Egypt, for that cause which here inueth. Jacob hauing begotten Ioseph of Rachel, loued him entirely, both in respect of the beauty of his body, as also of the ornaments and vertues of his spirit: and besides both these, his prudence, wherein he outstripped all his other brothers. This cordiall affection of his father, moued enuy and hatred amongst his brothers towards him. And besides these, the dreams which he had seene, and told both to his father and brethren; which foreprophecied vnto him a singular felicity. For, it is the common custome of men to be iealous of their prosperitie, with whom they are familiar.

Now the visions which Ioseph sawe in his dreame, were these. Being sent by his father in the company of his brothers, to reape corne in the time of haruest, he sawe a vision (farre different from those which accustomably happen in sleepe) which (as soone as he awoke) he told vnto his brethren, to the end they should interpret it. Hee tolde them therefore, that hee thought in his dreame the night past, that his sheafe of corne was setled in a place where hee had fixed it, and that theirs ranne towards his, and worshipped the same. Which vision of his seemed, to foretell him of his ample fortune; and how hee should obtaine the Lordship ouer all of them. But they concealed all these things from Ioseph, making shew that they could in no sort interpret the dream: but being by themselves apart, they breathed forth contrarie imprecations, wishing that

A that nothing of that which they interpreted as touching his dreame, might take effect, but per-seuering more and more in enuie and hatred towards him. But God (opposing his power against their enuie) sent Ioseph a second and more strange vision. For he dreamed that the sun, the moon, and eleuen of the starrs descended downe to the earth, and humbled themselves before him. Which vision he revealed to his father in the presence of his brethren (without suspicion of any hatred in them towards him) and besought him to interpret vnto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Iacob, he greatly reioiced at this dreame, by reason hee conceived in thereof. And (in comparing and alluding his coniectures not rashly, but with prudence) hee reioiced at those great matters which were signified by that dreame; which foretold, that his sonne Ioseph should be highly fortunate, and happy; and that the time should come in which his father, mother and brethren should honour him, and worship before him. For, he compared the moone (which ripeneth and encrease all things that grow) to his mother: and the sunne which giuech forme and force) to his father. And as touching his brothers, who were eleuen in number, he compared them to the eleuen starrs, (which receiued their force both from the sun and the moon.) Neither did Iacob without iudgement & consideration so interpret this vision. But, Iosephs brothers were highly aggrieved at this prelag, conceiuing as hainously and hatefully therof, as if this felicity had bin portended to a stranger, and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatsoever, being as well allied in felicity vnto him as in consanguinity. Whereupon they resolu'd on his death and destruction, and hauing consploted these counsailes amongst themselves, and gathered in their harvest, they retired themselves with their flockes towards Sichem (which was a part of that countrey) very fit to nourish and feed their cattell, where they kept their flockes without giuing any notice of their departure to their father. But he perceiuing that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tydings, being sorrowfull and carefull of his sonnes, he sent Ioseph to the flockes, to vnderstand how they did, and how their affaires prospered.

CHAP. III.

How IOSEPH was sold into Egypt by his brethren, and grew in great credit in that country: and how his brethren at length were under his subiection.

D Vt so soone as they saw their brother comming towards them, they reioiced, not as if Ioseph com-B the arruall of one of their household friends sent vnto them by their father, but as if their brethren my had encountred them; who by the will of God was deliuered into their hands. Ioseph com-They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let slip the present opportunitie. Ioseph com-But Ruben the eldest amongst them seeing their disposition and conspiracie to kill him, ende-uoured to dissuade them, setting before their eyes how hainous and wicked the enterprise was, Ioseph com-and what hatred they might incurre thereby. For (sayd hee) if before God and before men it Ioseph com-bee a wicked and detestable thing to lay hands on, and to murder a stranger: how much more Ioseph com-haynous a crime will it bee helde for vs, to bee convicted to be the murderers of our brother? Ioseph com-E whose death will heape sorrow on our fathers head: and draw our mother into great griefe and Ioseph comdesolation through the losse of her sonne, robbed and bereft from her beyond the ordinary Ioseph com-course of men. For which cause he prayed them to be aduised in these things, & that they would Ioseph com-consider in their mindes, what thing might happen, if this child, who was faire, vertuous and Ioseph com-young, should bee done to death: praying them to giue ouer this vnnaturall resolution, and to Ioseph comfeare God, who was both the Iudge and Witnesse of their deliberation intended against their Ioseph com-brother: and that if they would desist from this hainous act, God would take pleasure in their Ioseph com-repentance and reconciliation; but if they proceeded in their enterprise, he assured them that he Ioseph com-would punish them like fratricides; since nothing is hidden from his prouidence, whether it bee Ioseph com-committed in the desert, or attempted in the City. For, where soeuer men are, there is it alwaies Ioseph com-F to be thought, that God likewise is. Further, that when they should haue perpetrated this fact, Ioseph com-they should alwaies haue their consciences as an armed aduersarie against them, which Ioseph comneuer would forsake them, whether they were good, or whether such as theirs would bee; if they Ioseph com-should fortune to murder their brother. Furthermore he alleaded, that it was an impious fact Ioseph comto kill a mans owne brother, although he had done him iniurie; and much more meritorious Ioseph comto forgive a mans friend, that had offended against him. Moreover he sayd, that Ioseph had done Ioseph com-them no wrong, whose tender yeeres rather required cure and compassion at their handes, Ioseph com-

then hate and tyranny. Besides that, the cause of his slaughter would aggravate their offence, G if it should be known that for enuy of his future felicity they should take away his life, all which good hap they likewise might participate by reason of consanguinity, and that it was their dutie to think, that whatsoeuer blessing God imparted to Ioseph was theirs; and that for that cause they were to imagine, that God would be more displeased against them, if they should endeavour to deprive him of his life, whom hee had esteemed and adiudged worthy of prosperity to come. Ruben alleging these and many other things, besought them and laboured to diuert them from shedding their brothers blood: but seeing that all these his motives could in no sort mollify them, but that they hastened the rather to commit & perpetrate the murder; hee counselled them that at least while they should allow him some milder kind of death. Telling them that hee endeouored all what in him lay at the first to dissuade them: but since it was throughly resolved among them that hee should not liue, that lesse mischief should follow of it, if they would bee ruled by his counsell; for by that meanes their will should haue effect, yet, a more milde and lesse hurtfull in comparison of murder: that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keep them immaculate by casting him into the next pit, & there leauing him in the hands of death: to this counsell all of them agreed. So Ruben took Ioseph and bound him with cords, and let him down easily into a pit which was drie, which done hee departed to seeke out a more conuenient place for pasture.

Ruben persuadeth them to cast Ioseph into a pit. Ecdio & Rufinus. chap. 3.

Gen. 37. 39.

Ioseph by the counsell of Iuda is sold to the Arabian merchants.

Ruben by night committeth to the pit.

But when Ruben was gone, Iuda one of Iacobs sonnes (espying certaine merchants of Arabia, of the countrey of the Imadites, who from the countrey of Galaden caried Spicery & Syrian merchandise into Egypt) counsell'd his brothers to drawe vp Ioseph out of the well, and to sell him to those Arabians, assuring them by that means it would conuey to pass that Ioseph should die, the farther off from them amongst strangers; and as touching themselves, they should bee exempt from that pollution: which counsell of his being commended by them all, they drew Ioseph out of the pit, and sold him to the Arabians for the summe of twenty siluerlings; at such time as he was seauenty yeres of age. Now had Ruben resolved in himselfe to saue Ioseph without his brothers priuilege: for which cause comming by night vnto the pit, he called him with a loud voice and seeing that he gaue him no answere, hee began to coniecture with himselfe that his brethren had done him to death, hee reprobred them therefore very bitterly; but after they had tolde him what was become of him, he gaue ouer his mourning. After these things were thus brought to passe, the brethren confaked amongst themselves in what sort they might cleere themselves from their fathers suspicion, and concluded among themselves to teare the coat wherewith Ioseph was attired, at such time as he came vnto them, and which they had taken from him; when they cast him into the well, to the end that hauing defiled it in the blood of a Goat, they might afterwards bare it vnto their father & shew it him, to the end he might suppose that Ioseph was slain by wilde beasts; which done, they came vnto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his sons misfortunes) and tolde him that they had not seen their brother Ioseph, neither could they assure him what mishap had befallen him; but that notwithstanding they had found his ierkin altogether bebloudied and troy, which made them suspect that he was slain by some wilde beasts, if so be he were sent vnto them attired in that coat.

Ioseph by others perswade his father that he is deuoured by wilde beasts.

Iacob bewaileth Ioseph for dead. Ioseph is sold in Egypt to Putifar.

Putifars wife solicite Ioseph to lie with her.

But Iacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more succesfull tidings, in that he supposed & hoped that Ioseph had only been captiue) gaue ouer this opinion, and took the coat for a most assured testimony of his sonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith at such time as he sent him to his brothers: for which cause he lamented Ioseph, from that time forward as being dead, & as if he had not any more sons. And such was the griefe of his heart, that he conceiued no consolation in the rest, but suffered himselfe to be perswaded by the brothers; that Ioseph had bin slaine by sauage beasts; he therefore sat him down being clothed in sackcloth, and charged with sorrow; and neither could his sons by their counsells mitigate his moanes, nor he himselfe remit the rigor of his lamentation.

Now Ioseph was sold by the merchants & bought by Putifar (an Egyptian Lord, and a steward of king Pharaohs household) who held him in high estimation, and trained him vp in all liberal sciences, suffering him to liue not after a seruile, but liberall manner, and committing vnto his charge the care of all his household, all which fauours hee made vse of. Yet was he no waies diuerted by these his priuiledges and promotions from his innated vertue, testifying hereby, that prudence doth not submit to aduersitie fortune, if a man vse the same orderly, and not at that time only when fortune faueth and flattereth.

It fortuned not long after, that his masters wife was enamoured with him, both in respect of

of his beautie, as also of the dexteritie and diligence; supposing that if shee opened her minde vnto him, she might the more easily enioy him, and that hee might esteeme it a part of his felicity, to be beloued by his mistress. All which she supposed and imagined, hauing onely regard of that seruile condition, wherein at that present he was, and not of his manners which continued alwaies entire; notwithstanding any change that could happen vnto him: for which cause shee discovered vnto him her desire, and desired him to grant her an amorous encounter; but he refused her demand, alledging that it were a most wicked requitall of him towards his master, if it should come to passe that he who had bought him, and so greatly honored him, should receiue so great an iniurie and outrage: for which cause he exhorted her, to conquer her appetite, depriving her of all hope of euer compassing her concupiscence, alledging vnto her; that desire is then lesse active when hope is extinguished; auowing that hee had rather suffer all the mischiefs that might be imagined, then to consent or condiscend vnto her in that wickedness. And although (said he) it bee vndecent for a seruant to contradict the will of his mistress, yet that the filchinesse of the fact did dissuade him from attempting the same. But this his repulse did more and more inflame her, for that she supposed that Ioseph should not denie her: and her disordinate affections increasing daily, she deuised and complotted a new meanes in hope to bring her loue to her desired issue.

Whereas therefore a solemne and publike feast was at hand, wherein according to custome, the Ladies were wont to dignifie the solemnitie by their assistance: she fained a sicknes, perswading her husband thereunto, hoping by that meanes she might haue the better opportunitie (in being solitarie and alone) to sollicite Ioseph: which falling out accordingly (as she had her selfe desired) she began to court and compasse him by these flattering and fawning allurements and perswasions. Telling him that hee had done well if vpon her first request he had obied her without any contradiction, in respect of her dignity who required the same, & her incredible passion which had so farre commaunded her, that notwithstanding she were his mistress, she should indigne and forget her selfe so much as to sollicite him: that now he should behaue himselfe more wisely and better; if in amends of his forepassed obstinacie he now at last would consent. For if hee respected this her second summons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (saith she) I haue fained sicknesse to this ende, to sollicite and preferre thy company before a publike triumph. Or if at first thou didst mistrust me, thou maist hereby conceiue that I doe not maliciously tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the same affection. For which cause euer make choise of this present pleasure, and be obsequious to her that loueth thee, vnder hope of further preferments, or bee assured of my hate and reuenge if thou preferrest thy opinion of chastitie before my fauour. For bee assured that thy chastitie shall profit thee nothing; if I shall accuse thee to my husband, and auow that thou hast sought to violate me: for although thy allegations bee more true, yet shall my words be of more force, and my accusations more acceptable in Putifars eares then thine. But neither by these words, nor her teares the witnesses of her vovues, could Ioseph bee peruerted, neither could remorse ouerworke him, nor terrour compell him to forsake his purposed chastitie, but that hee constantly resisted against those iniust afflictions, wherewith she threatned him: choosing rather to suffer any misery whatsoeuer, then to bee prisoned with the possession of her offered adulteries, being well assured that he was worthy of extreme punishment, if on a womans intreatie hee should condiscend to any such treacherie. He likewise admonished her of her duetie, alledging the lawes, rights, and customes of matrimonie, willing her rather to respect them, then her momentanie lust: for that the one was speedily followed with repentance, proceeding sodainly of griefe, not amendment of sinne, with a continuall and great feare likewise; least the fact should bee discovered: whereas the company she might haue with her husband, was void of daunger, and attended by a conscience, as well before God as men. Moreouer, that it was more conuenient for her to gouerne and commaund him as his Lady & Mistress, rather then to be shamed in making him the secretary of their common sinne: for that it is more conuenient to be assured in the confidence of a good life, then in secret to commit sinne. In these and such words sought hee to abate the brunt of her furious affection; and to reuoke her from her depraued fancies; to submit to the law of reason; but she, the more instantly he dissuaded, the more earnestly invaded him; and where by no meanes she could peruert him by words, she laid violent hands vpon him, to constrain him perforce: but Ioseph (vnable to indure any longer the intemperancie of the woman, leauing his garment behind him whereby she held him) brake sodainly out of the chamber. She partly impelled by the griefe of repulse, partly affrighted with feare, least her lasciuiousnes should be made known

Ioseph once more repulseth the assaults of her suit.

Ioseph leauing his raiment behind him fled from the adulteresse.

32 To her husband, decreed first of all falsely to accuse Ioseph, and by this meanes to take reuenge G vpon him; holding it to be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all accuse her accuser. She therefore sat her downe sad and perplexed, colouring the griefe of her defrauded lust vnder the cloake of indignation for her attempted honour, and violated chastitie. Now when her husband came home, and (being troubled in mind to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof: Live thou no longer (said she) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slave, who attempted to violate thy bed, forgetting both what hee was when he came into thy house, and with how great beneuolence thou hast entertained him, yea who was to be esteemed more ingrate then ingratitude, except euery way he approved himselfe faithfull vnto thee: yet hath he not forborne to offer iniurie, no not to thine owne wife: and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence, whereby it manifestly appeareth that the moderati- H on which hitherto he pretended, rather proceeded of seruile feare, then natie modesty. And that which hath the more emboldened him, is in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast fauored him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiving that hee was preferred before all thine auncient seruants, he thought it lawfull likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy wife: and to procure more credit to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behind him at such time as he sought to violate her. But Pu-tifar intangled by the words and teares of a woman, and attributing too much to his wiues dissembling loue, omitting the further and faithfull inquisition of the truth, after he had first of all praised his wiues faith and loyalty, he cast Ioseph thus condemned of hainous wickednes into the prison of malefactors, esteeming his wiues chastitie, and commending it the more, in that hee I was now made a witness of her approued honestie.

But Ioseph committing his innocencie vnto God, neither tooke care how to excuse himselfe, neither to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessitie of his bonds, he was onely comforted with this one hope, namely that God was more powerfull, then they that had imprisoned him: whose prouidence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that wherein hee imploied him, as also the dignity of his forme, looked him out of bonds, and by that meanes in some sort lessened his misery, giuing him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of the prisoners had. Now when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labor) conferred together (as men in miserie are wont to doe) and questioned among themselves of the cause of their damnation: K a certaine butler neere about the King (condemned by him in displeasure to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Ioseph; and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and prouident man, he told him his dreame, praying him that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that hee would expound it vnto him, lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from heauen by dreames. For hee said that in his sleepe he beheld three great clusters of grapes, hanging on three severall branches of a vine, which were all ripe and ready to be gathered, and that him thought hee pressed them into a cup which the king held, and that afterwards hauing strained the must, hee offered it to the King, and that hee willingly drank thereof: now when he had shewed him his dreame, he desired him that if he had any knowledge giuen him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his L vision vnto him. Ioseph answered him that he should be of good courage, willing him to expect, that within three daies hee should be deliuered from his bonds, and be admitted againe to the kings seruice, and restored to his former credit. For he interpreted that the vine bringeth forth a fruit verie good and profitable for mans vse, for that by the mediation thereof faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolued: furthermore that troubles and sorrowes were asswaged by the vse thereof, in stead of which pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest mee that the king receiued being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore that thou hast a good dreame offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliuerance from misery within three daies, according to the number of those clusters which thou gatheredst in thy dreame. Remember me therefore I pray thee, as soone as the euent hath approued this my pre- M diction to be faithfull and vnfained; and when thou art at liberty, forget vs not that are left here to lie in miserie, who departest to enioy thy foretold felicitie; for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednes, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modestie, in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I liued, and his credit who committed mee to prison, then mine owne pleasure. And thus the butler as it became him, reioyced at the interpretation of his dreame, and expected the euent. Now a ceruine other seruant, who had the command

command of the kings bakers, and liuing in the same prison with the butler, conceiuing some hope through Ioseph to happy interpretation (for that he likewise had seene a vision) desired him to expound vnto him what interpretation was to be had of a dreame, which hee had the night past, which hee expressed in these words. Me thought (said he) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which two were replenished with bread, and the other with flesh (and diuers other kinds of eates, such as are prepared for kings.) But the birdes of the ayre hovering round about me, deuoured all the victuals, being nothing appauled by mee, although I choue them from thence. Which said, he expected a presage no lesse fortunate then the former.

But Ioseph (after he had considered vpon the circumstances of the dreame, and foretold him that he would rather haue informed him of more successfull fortunes, then his dreame did intend:) told him that he had onely two daies left him, wherein he was to liue: For these were designed by the two baskets: but by the third, that hee should be hanged and deuoured by the foules, which he could not driue from him. Neither did it otherwhile fall out with both of them; then Ioseph had foretold: For vpon the prefixed day, the king (celebrating the feast of his natiuitie) commanded that the bakers should be hanged: but as touching the butler, hee deliuered him from his bonds, & restored him to his former office. But God deliuered Ioseph (after he had for the space of two yeares spent his time in the misery of the prison; and was in the meane space no waies assisted by the vngratefull butler) by preordinating this meanes and manner of his liber-tie. Whereas king Pharao had that night in his sleepe seene two visions; and had also receiued the interpretation thereof, forgetting the one, hee onely remembered him of the dreames, which in his opinion had no fortunate signification. Whereupon early in the morning (calling before him the learnedst amongst the Egyptians) he required the interpretation thereof: Now when hee could in no sort be satisfied by them, the king was the more and more moued: which when the butler apperceiued, hee remembered him of Ioseph, and of his wisdom and prudence in these sorts of coniectures; and repairing vnto the king told him of Ioseph and of his vision, and the euent thereof, which hee had while hee was in prison, together with *Ioseph*s interpretation; and how the same day, the master of the bakers condemned to the gallows, gaue greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept prisoner as a slave by Putifar the master of his household; and that he said how amongst the Hebrewes he was descended of good and honourable parents.
Command him therefore (said he) to be sent for, neither despise the man for his present miserie, for thou maiest manifestly vnderstand by him, the signification of thy dreames. Whereupon the king sent for him presently, and friendly taking him by the hand, hee spake vnto him after this manner: Good yong man, in that I vnderstand by the report of my seruant, that thou art prudent; shew me the interpretation of my dreames in such manner as thou discoveredst his vnto him, and thou shalt doe me a high pleasure: but beware thou neither conceale any thing for feare, or speake ought for flatterie; or to feede mee with falsehoods, but tell me all things truly; although they shall in a sort breed my discontent to heare them. Me seemed that I walked by a riuer side, and that I saw seven wel fed and very fat kine, which rettyred themselves from the flood into the pasture: and againe, me thought that seven others came from the pasture to encounter them, who were very leane and vgly to behold, who when they had deuoured the seven others that were fat and great, yet neuer the more increased, but were all of them miserably vexed with hunger. But after this vision being awaked out of my sleepe; and troubled in my minde; thinking with my selfe, what that vision might signifie, being seized by little and little by a pleasant slumber, I fell asleepe once againe. And againe, I saw a vision more prodigious then the former, which doth likewise trouble and terrifie mee the more. For I saw seven eares sprong out of one roote, that hung downe and bowed their heads, because they were laden with graine ready to be reape: after which, there appeared seven other, weak, and languishing for want of dew, who deuouring those other great and full eares, left mee highly astonished. Hereunto Ioseph answered: This dreame (O king) although it hath been seene in two figures, yet so it is that it importeth one and the same accident, which is to ensue. For both those oxen (which are creatures borne and bred vp for the plough and labour) which you saw deuoured by the leane, and those eares of come consumed by the weaker, fore signifie a famine & scarcitie in Egypt for so many yeares, as there were Oxen and eares of come in good plight: so that the fertilitie of these good yeares shall be consumed by the sterilitie of so many other yeares, according to their number; and there shall be such scarcitie of necessarie prouision, that it shall be hard to preuent and supply their defects: all which is signified by those seven leane kine; who, hauing deuoured the good, could not be satisfied by the same. All these things God foretelleth vnto men, not to the end they should be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might provide for themselves, to the end they might more easily preuent the imminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay vp and store the abundance of the plentifully yeeres, Egypt shall not feele the penurie that shall follow. And when as the king (admiring at Iosephs prudence and wisdom) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plentie, how to preuent and redresse the future sterilitie: he warned and counsailed him, that the Egyptians should vse parcimony, and that that which remained of those yeeres superfluitie, might be reserved for future necessities. He counsailed him also to bind the husbandmen, that they should hoard vp their corne in their barnes, and only to distribute to the people as much as was sufficient, and no more. Hereupon the king (not onely praising Iosephs counsell, but also his interpretation of his dreames) made him Lord and commissarie of all the store; and commanded him to provide whatsoeuer he thought necessarie in that behalfe, either of his one or of the peoples: assuring him that he thought no man more necessarie to execute this counsell, then himselfe who was the author thereof. Having therefore this authoritie giuen him by the king to vse his owne signet, and to be clothed in purple, he was conducted thorow all the country vpon a chariot: and he assembled the labourers of corne, and distributed to euery one by measure, that which they wanted for feede corne, and for their nourishment, without letting any man vnderstand for what cause he did it.

About this time had he already attained to thirty yeeres old, being held in great honour by the king, and was for his incredible prudence, surnamed by him Phontomphanechus, which significth the discoverer of hidden things: he was also honoured with a wife of great dignitie, for by the procurement of the king, he tooke to wife a virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan priest, whose name was Afaneith, by whom he begat children also, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manasses, which significth Oblivion (because attaining better fortune, he grew in oblivion of his former miserie:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which significth Returne, for that he was restored to the libertie of his auncestors.) Now when as according to Iosephs interpretation, the seven yeeres of plentie and affluence were ouerpast in Egypt; the eighth yeere of famine began to infect the land: and for that the evil was vnexpected, the headlong multitude grievously trauailed with hunger and misery, began to flocke about the kings gates and garners. Hereon the king called for Ioseph, who presently distributing graine to those that wanted it, became without controuersie, the father & conseruer of the communitie. Neither did he onely make merchandize with those that inhabited that countrey: but with strangers also, deeming that the whole race of mankind was allied the one with the other; and that it was conuenient, that such as wanted should be succoured by their meanes, who had better fortune. And because the same calamitie both oppressed Chanaan and other kingdomes of the world, Iacob also sent all his sonnes into Egypt to fetch corne; (as soone as he vnderstood that strangers also had libertie to traffique in that place) onely with himselfe hee retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german vnto Ioseph: who as soone as they arrived in Egypt, repaired vnto Ioseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corne, (for nothing was done without his expresse command) for euen then found each man fit occasion to honour the king, when they bethought themselves how to honour Ioseph. He taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing lesse then of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them; and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and besides, no one of them might suspect that hee had attained to so great dignitie): determined to trie and tempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For hee both denied them his licence to buy corne, & commanded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were gathered of diuers nations, and they fained kinned: for how can it be (saith hee) that a priuat man should bring vp so many worthy sonnes, which felicitie scarcely and very seldom is granted vnto kings? This did he, to the end he might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate hee liued, during the time of his absence; and what was become of Benjamin his brother: for he was sore afraid, least they had offered the same hard measure to the lad, which they had inflicted on him. But they were strooken with a mightie feare, bethinking M them on their imminent perill, supposing that they had trauailed this long journey all in vaine: and for that they saw their accusation must be answered; Ruben the eldest of them, began after this manner to plead their common cause. Neither are we come hither (saith he) as spies, neither vnder pretence to indamage the king; but dire famine (whose furie wee seeke to preuent) hath compelled vs to come into this country, grounding our selues on your humanitie; who (as we haue heard) haue not onely made offer of sale of corne, and meanes of sustenance to your citizens: but also vnto

A vnto all strangers. And that we are brothers and borne of the same father, our very countenance testifie no lesse, in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our father by name, is Iacob; by nation, an Hebrew: who begat vs his twelue sonnes on foure women, who while they all were in safety, our affaires were fortunate and prosperous: but one of them being dead, whole continuall lamentations, whose teares do no lesse afflict vs, then in times past the vntimely death of our dearest brother did affect vs. Now are we come to buy corne, having left in our fathers custody the yongest of our brothers called Benjamin: That thus it is, if so thou please to send any one vnto our house, thou maist be assured. Thus spake Ruben both on his owne and his brothers behalfe; whereby he might exempt from Iosephs sinister opinion of them: who knowing that both his father and brother were in health, commaunded them to bee shut in prison, vnder pretence to call them to further examination vpon his better leisure. Some three daies after (calling them before him) he beganne thus: Since (saith hee) you protest that you came not hither into this kingdom on purpose, either to preiudice the King, or worke treasons towards the State; and that you pretend your selues to be the sonnes of one father: you shall induce mee to beleue that your allegations be true, if leauing some one with me as pledge of your loyalties (who shall bee well entertained) you beare hence your desired corne vnto your father, and returne agayne vnto me, bringing with you your brother, whom (as you say) you left behind you: for this shall be an Argument that you faune not. Amazed at these words, and supposing that their extreame civility was at hand, they lamented their fortunes, oftentimes expostulating amongst themselves, that the dire reuenge of their brother oppressed with vndecent tyranny, was fallen vpon them. C Moreouer, Ruben reprehended their too late and vnprofitable penitencie, saying, that those afflictions which God (the iust reuenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were constantly to be borne. After this manner spake they one vnto another, supposing that no man was present who vnderstood the Hebrew tongue: and they all lamented being inwardly touched with the words of Ruben, and condemned their perpetrated wickednes, as if they had not bin the authors of the fact, for which at that time they thought that God did most iustly punish them. Ioseph beholding them in this perplexity, vnable to dissemble any longer his brotherly loue, in that the teares already began to burst out of his eyes, which at that time he desired to conceale, he departed from among them.

D Not long after returning agayne vnto them, he retained Simeon with him, who in the meane time should remaine as pledge with him vntill their back returne, and giuing them licence to buy their corne, he commaunded them to depart: giuing withall a speciall commaundement to one of his seruants, that the money which they had brought to buy corne, should secretly be shut vp in their sacks, and they permitted to depart; all which his seruant performed. But Iacob's sonnes returning into Chanaan tolde their father all that which had happened vnto them in Egypt, and how they were attached for spies, and traytors to that countrey; and that when they protested that they were brethren, and that the eleuenth was left at home with their father, they would not beleuee them: moreouer that Simeon was left pledge with the Gouverneur, vntill Benjamin came thither to giue testimony of their truth: whereupon they desired their father, without contradiction or sinister conceit, to send their younger brother with them. But Iacob was displeased with that which his sonnes had done; and whereas hee was not a little grieved that Simeon was left behind, he thought it worse then death also to be deprived of Benjamin; and neither could Ruben with his prayers (offering his sonnes for pledges, that if any sinister fortune should fall vpon Benjamin by the way, the Grandfather might reuenge him on his children) perswade Iacob to yeeld consent: but they vncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their money inclosed in their sacks of corne. Now when corne beganne already to faile them, Iacob being compelled by force of famine, determined to send Benjamin with his other brothers: for it was vnlawfull for them to returne into Egypt, except they kept their couenant. And whereas necessitie pressed them daily more and more, and his sonnes ceased not instantly to call vpon him; yet as yet was hee doubtfull and vnresolved: at last Juda a man vehement by nature, began more liberally to reprove his father, in that he was too carefull of his brother, to whom nothing might happen without the will of God, whether it were abroad or at home: and that without reason he had care of his sonne Benjamin, in such sort as it was not possible for them to get ought out of Pharaohs countrey which was necessarie for their nourishment; that he ought also to haue care of the life of Simeon, least whilest he dallied and delayed to sende Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the meane time should be slaine by the Egyptians. Moreouer hee exhorted him him to commit the care of his sonne vnto God, promising to bring him backe againe in safetie, or else to die together with him: Moreouer hee layd, that certaine giftes gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the iuice of Mirabolans, Staete, Terebinth, and Hony, should be sent as presents vnto Ioseph, together with the double price of their corne. Thus shedding teares on both sides, they depart from their father, leaving him miserably tormented for the health of his sonnes, and contrariwise suspecting with themselves, least thorow his absence their father should be slain with sorrow. In this perplexity spent they a whole day. At last the old man remained in his house wholly afflicted, and they trauiailing into Egypt, did mitigate their present griefe with the hope of better fortune; where no sooner were they arrived, but they repaired vnto Ioseph, being sore afraid least it should be laid to their charge, that vnder colour of fraud and deceit they had caried away with them the price of their former corne; which presently before Iosephs steward they carefully excused, saying, that they found the mony among their wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks, which now in discharge of their truth they had brought backe againe: but he denying that he ener misst their money, & they being deliuered from this feare, began to be more secure; so that Siméon was sodainly set at liberty to conuerse among his brethren. Now when Ioseph was returned from the seruice of the king they offer him presents: and enquiring of them how their father did, they answered that he was in health: then perceiuing that Beniamin was yet aliue, whom he sawe among them, he asked whether that were their younger brother, and hearing that it was hee, hee onely vttered these words, that God had the prouidence of all things, and departed from them being vnwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which hee could not any longer containe. Inuited them afterwarde vnto a banquet, he commaunded them to sit downe in order according as they were wont to do when they were with their father, and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honoured Beniamin with a double share. After the banquet, at such time as they were all laid downe to rest, he commaunded the Steward to measure out the wheat, which euery one should beare away with him, and to hide the price thereof againe in their sacks; but in Beniamins sacke he commaunded him to put his cup where in he most delighted: which hee therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loues towards Beniamin, and whether they would sticke vnto him being accused of theft, or leaving him behinde as a malefactor, returne vnto their father, as if the matter no waies touched them. Which being done according as he had commaunded it, early in the morning all Jacobs sonnes arose, and taking with them Siméon, departed on wards of their iourney, reioycing as well at his restitution, as Beniamins returne, whom they both promised and protested to bring backe againe to their father; when behold sodainly a troupe of horsemen roundly beset them, amongst whom was that seruant who had hid the cup in the sacke. Now they being troubled by this sodaine incursion, and asking them why they set vpon them whom they so lately had both inuited & entertained to honourably? the Egyptians answered and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits received, and Iosephs gentlenesse & humanity, were so wicked as to returne him iniuries for his courtesies, threatening them that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them that although for a time they had deceiued the minister of the table, yet could they not deceiue God; and againe, asking them whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished. In these or such like speeches the seruant insulted ouer them. But they, who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, that they wondred at the mans intemperancy, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keepe backe, no nor the price of their corne which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselves knew ought of that money, so farre were they from purposely offering any wrong: yet in that they thought this inquisition would better satisfie them, then deniall, they bid them search their sacks, offering themselves each of them to suffer punishment if any one of them were found guiltie of the theft. This search which they offered, the Egyptians accepted, yet referred they the punishment to be inflicted onely on him who had done the iniury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sacke, at last they came vnto Beniamins, not for that they were ignorant that the cup lay hid in his sacke, but that they might seeme to discharge their dutie more cunningly: now all the rest being secured in themselves, they onely as yet were carefull of their brother Beniamin; they hoped also that hee would not be found guilty of falsehood: for which cause they more freely vpbraided their persecutors, obiecting vnto them how thorow their importunitie they had bene hindered the better part of their iourney. Now as they searched Beniamins sacke, they found the cup: whereupon all the brothers began to mourne and lament, both bewailing their brothers fortune, fortune, who was like presently to suffer death for the theft; and their owne mishap, who hauing plighted their faiths vnto their father for Beniamins safe returne, were compelled to falsifie the same thorow this present accident. And that which further increased their griefe, was, that when as they most of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were by fortunes enuy thrust into so great calamitie: confessing themselves to be the authors both of their fathers, and this their brothers misfortune; who neuer ceased to importune and compell their father (although he were vnwilling and resisted) to send the childe with them.

Now the horsemen hauing laid hands on Beniamin, led him vnto Ioseph; whom his brothers presently followed. Who beholding his brother thrust into prison, and the rest bemoaning their round about him in mourning habits: Haue you, sayd he (O most wicked men) either so contemned my humanity, or Gods prouidence, as that you durst attempt and offer such an hainous iniury against him, who entertained you with hospitality, and dismissed you with benefits? To whom they answered, that they were ready to suffer punishment for Beniamin, calling againe to their remembrance Iosephs iniuries, saying: that he was happy, who deliuered by death from life was exempt from all calamities; and that (if he liued) God inflicted that plague on them for his sake. They said also, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their father, because that (to his former sorrow, which he had conceived euen vntil that time of Iosephs death) they had also annexed this new miserie: neither did Ruben desist to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickednesse which they had committed. But Ioseph told them that he dismissed them all (saying that their innocency was approued vnto him) and that hee onely would be contented with the lads punishment: For (said hee) neither is it reasonable that he should be deliuered for the loue of those who had not offended: neither that they should be punished for him, who had done the theft. He commaunded them therefore to depart, and promised them safe conduct on their way.

Whilest all of them were grievously wounded with these words (so that scarcely one of them could speak for sorrow) Iuda (who had perswaded his father to send Beniamin with them, & who amongst the rest was a man of confidence) purposed to expose himselfe to all danger, vnder resolution to deliuer his brother from perill: whereupon he addressed himselfe to Ioseph and spake thus. Dred Lord (quoth hee) wee confesse that we are all ready to suffer punishment (although we haue not all of vs committed the offence, but onely the youngest amongst vs) and although we suppose his life to be almost desperate, yet our only hope as yet resteth in your goodnesse and clemencie. For which cause we beseech you, that you will not only haue compassion of vs, but of your owne nature, and that in this case you would be pleased to take counsaile, not of your iust indignation, but your natie goodnesse: governing your wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and small occurrences, are wont to submit. Consider, I pray you, whether it stand with your dignity to kill those, who present themselves to be punished, & desire in no sort to liue, except it be by the benefit of your mercie. Suffer not your selfe to be deprived of this honour: that after you haue deliuered vs from famine and liberally furnished vs with corne, so of your mercie likewise you haue permitted vs to return vnto our family, being travelled by the same perill, and to bring them home sustentance. For one and the same bounty is it to continue them in life, who are travelled with famine; and to forgiue them death, who haue merited it by their offences: to whom their wickednes hath enuied that bounty which you haue heroically extended towards them. It is one and the same grace imparted by you in diuers manners. For thou shalt saue those whom thou hast fed; and that life which thou wouldest not suffer to faile by force of famine, thou shalt redeliuer and giue againe: whereby thy clemencie may be more commendable, whilest both thou giuest life, and those things likewise whereby life is maintained. Moreover, I thinke that God himselfe hath giuen thee this means to expresse thy verue, that it may appeare that thou settest lighter by the iniuries offered vnto thee, then by thy will to doe good; and that thou art not liberal to them only, who are poore and innocent. For although it be a great praise to yeeld succour in aduersities; yet is a prince no lesse honoured by his clemencie, especially in a cause that concerneth his particular interest. For if they that remit smal offences, are followed by deserved praise; what is it to restraine a mans ire in a capitall crime; doth it not most neerely approximate the diuine clemencie? And hadde I not good experience by Iosephs death, how greivously my father digesteth the want of his children, I would not so earnestly intreat for his safety, but so farre forth & no otherwise, but as it might redound to the praise of thy clemencie; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both griefe and discontent, we were willing all of vs to suffer punishment. But now whereas we haue not so much commiseration of our selues (although as yet we be but young, and haue not much tasted the pleasures, and fruit of this life) as of our wretched parent being drowned in yeares and cares, we offer vp & vnto thee these our prayers in his name also, and beseech thee to graunt vs life, though at this day wee are vnder thy iustice for our offences. Assuredly hee is a good man, and begat vs, that wee should bee like vnto him: worthy is hee neuer to taste or be tried by any such calamitie, who now thorow our absence is disquieted with care and sorrow. Now if so be hee should receive any tidings either of our death, or the cause thereof; he will not indure any more to liue: the infamy of our deaths will shorten his daies; and make his death by this meanes more unhappy, who rather then he should heare the rumours of our shame, would hasten his death in suppo- sing them. All these wel considered, (although thou art iustly moued by this offence;) remit the reuenge vnto our father, and rather let thy pity towards him; then our inquiry towards thee, pre- uail with thee. Impart this honor to his old age: which if it be deprivied of our presence, neither wil, nor can desire to liue; yeeld this respect to thy fathers memory; yea ascribe it to the very name of a father, wherewith thou art honoured: so God the father of all men, will blesse thee in that name, and fortunate thee in thy increase: whom also thou shalt honour, if in respect of that com- mon name, thou take compassion of our father, in considering the sorrowe that hee shall in- dure, if perhaps he shall be deprivied of his children. It now lieth in your power to giue vs that, which you may deprivie vs of, by that power which God hath giuen you: and in doing vs this fa- uour you shall imitate the nature of God; and in this respect become like vnto him. For, since it lieth in your power to doe both the one and the other, it were better thou didst good then euill, and contenting thy selfe with thy power, not to remember or venge thy reuenge: but onely to thinke that thy power was giuen thee, to keepe and conserue men; and that the more mercie thou extendst towards many, the more honour thou redoubtest on thy head: now it lieth in thy power by forgiuing our brothers error to giue vs all life. For neither can we be safe, except hee be saued, neither may we returne home vnto our father, except he returne: but heere must wee suffer whatsoeuer our brother suffereth. Neither do we craue any other mercy at thy hand (drad Prince) if we be repulsd in this, but that thou wilt inflict one and the same punishment on vs, in no other manner, then as if we had been partakers of the felony: for this were more better for vs, then that wee our selues thorow sorrow, should offer violence to our owne soules. I will not allege or venge his youth, or iudgement as yet vnripened, neither will I inferre that pardon is usually granted vnto such: but here will I make an end, that whether we be condemned in that I haue not sufficiently pleaded his cause, or whether we be absolued; we may wholly ascribe this K grace to your fauour and clemency: to the bounds of whose praise this likewise shall be added, that not only thou hast saued vs, but also in pardoning vs of the punishment which we haue iust- ly deserued, hast had more care of vs then wee our selues. If therefore it be thy pleasure to ad- iudge him to die, suffer mee to suffer for him, and send him backe vnto our father: or if it please thee to retaine him for thy slaue, I am more fit then he to doe all sorts of seruices, as you may perceiue; and am ready to suffer all that which may bee inflicted on me. When Iuda had spo- ken thus, he humbled himselfe at Iosephs feet, endeavouring as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appease his ire; in like sort also all the other brothers prostrated themselves, offering themselves to die for Benjamin.

But Ioseph conquered with pitie, and vnable any longer to personate a displeased man, sent a- way all those that were present, and being alone with them, discovered himselfe vnto his bro- thers: and in this sort to them only he disclosed himselfe and saide. I cannot but commend the- pietie and loue which you beare vnto your brother, which I find to be greater then I did expect, gathering my coniectures from those things which in times past haue hapned vnto me. For to this end haue I done all this; that I might make triall of your brotherly beneuolence: whereof since you haue giuen me a notable prooffe, I will not ascribe that which you haue donne vnto me, to your natures, but rather wholly to the wil of God, who hath at this present furnished you with all things which are profitable for you, and will hereafter giue you greater things, if he with- draw not his fauourable hand from vs. When as therefore I vnderstood of my fathers rather de- sired then hoped health, and found you to be such as I desired you should be towards your bro- ther, I freely forget those iniuries which in times past were done vnto me: rather making choice to giue you thanks as the ministers of Gods providence, that against this time provided for our common profit, then remember mee (as then it seemed vnto me) of your pretended malice. I therefore pray you, that forgetting those things which are past, you wil be of courage and waxe confident, suffering willingly the good euent of an ill intent, neither that blushing at your for- mer faults, you should be any wayes amared. Let not therefore the euill sentence which in times, past past you pronounced against mee, any waies trouble you, since you perceiue it hath wanted ef- fect: but reioice ye at these works of God, and go and tell your father that which you haue scene, for feare least he being consumed with immoderate care of you, I my self be deprivied of the chie- fest fruit of my felicity, before he come to my presence and be made partaker of those benefites. Wherefore depart you, & bringing with you him, your wiues, and children, and al your kindred, come backe vnto me: for it were inconuenient (my deare brethren) that you should not be parta- kers of my felicity, especially since this famine is as yet to continue for the terme of siue yeares. This said, Ioseph embraced his brethren: but they were wholly confounded in tears and sorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had sinned against so kinde a brother. After all this, there followed a banquet. And the king vnderstanding that Iosephs brethren were arrived, The king re- ioiceth to know that Iosephs bro- thers were ar- rived. (as if some good fortune had befallen him) right heartily reioyced, and he gaue them chariots laden with corne, and golde, and siluer, with other presents to present their father with, who en- riched with diuers gifts (some by their brother vnto his father, other some to them: selues, but in especiall to Benjamin) they returned home into their countrey. But after that Iacob vnderstood by his sonnes in what estate his sonne Ioseph was, that he had not only escaped from death (which he had so long time bewailed) but also that he liued in high prosperity, and ministred to the king of Egypt, and had welny the whole gouernment of he kingdom vnder his hands: he easily be- lieued all things that were told him, & acknowledged the great works of God, and his goodnesse shewed vnto him, although for a time it seemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he ad- dressed himselfe to go and visit his sonne Ioseph.

BVt when he arrived neere the fountaine of Couenant, hee offered in that place a sacri- fice vnto God; and fearing least his children should inhabit Egypt, by reason of the fertility of the place, and that his posteritie by not returninge backe into the land of Chanaan, should leese the possession of that which God had promised them; and furthermore, doubting least that his journey into Egypt, being by him enterprised against the will of God, should be ominous vnto his children; and suspecting likewise least he should die be- fore he came to Iosephs presence: he was wonderfully perplexed in mind. Whilest thus he rumina- ted and examined these things in his thought, he was surprised with a heavy sleepe, during which time God appeared vnto him and called him twice by his name: who asking who it was that cal- led him, God answered: Doeest thou not acknowledge (O Iacob) that God, who hath both pro- tected thee and thy auncesters, and succoured you all in your necessities? who contrarie to thy fathers purpose made thee Lord of his family, and when as by thy selfe thou diddest trauell into Mesopotamia, I brought to passe, that being matched in wedlocke very happily, thou returnedst into thy countrey backe againe, being blessed with many children, and stored with much riches. I also kept thy progenie in safety, and when it seemed thou hadst lost Ioseph, I raised him to that high steeppe of dignitie wherein now he liueth; and made him the next in person to the king of Egypt. And now also I am come vnto thee vnto this end, that I may guide thee in this thy jour- ney, and that I may foretell thee that thou shalt leaue thy life betwixt the hands of Ioseph, and that thy posteritie shall bee mightie and famous for many ages, and shall possesse that land, the empire whereof I haue promised them. Assured and made confident by this dreame, he more willingly hastened, both he, his sons, with all their progeny into Egypt, whose number amount- ed to the summe of 70. Their names in that they are somewhat hard, I had not written down, except it were to satisfie som, who contend that we are Egyptians and not Mesopotamians. The sonnes of Iacob therefore were twelue in number, of whom Ioseph came thither long before them. Now are the rest to be reckoned vp with euery one of their progenies. Ruben had foure sonnes, Aioches, Phalles, Essaron, and Charmisus. Simeon had sixe, Iumilus, Iaminus, Puthodus, Iache- nus, Goar, Saar. Leui also had three, Gelsimis, Caathus, and Mararis. Iuda had likewise three, Sala, Phares, Zara; with two sonnes of Phares, Efrom and Amyras. Issachar had foure, Thulus, Phyras, Iobus, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elon, and Ianel. And these were the children he had by Lea, who also led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amount- eth to 33. But Rachel had two sonnes, of which the elder who was called Ioseph, had likewise two, Manasses and Ephraim. But Benimin had ten, Bolossus, Baccharis, Asabel, Gela, Nemanes, Iles, Aros, Nomphtis, Optatis, and Sarodus. These foureteen added to those abouenamed, make vp the

the number of fortie seuen. And this was the legitime issue of Iacob. But on Bala Rachels hand-maid Dan and Nephtalim, who was attended by foure sonnes, Eleinus, Gunes, Sares & Hellimus. But Dan had onely one sonne called Ysis. Now if those be added to the aboue named, they make vp the number of 54. But Gad and Affer were borne by Zelpha Leas handmaid, of these Gad was attended by seuen sonnes: Zophonias, Ygis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Eredes and Ariel. Affer had one daughter and sixe male children, whose names were Iomnes, Effus, Iebus, Baris, Abarnus, Melmiel. These fifteen being added to the foresaid fiftie foure, make vp the number abouenamed, together with Iacob. But Ioseph vnderstanding that his father was at hand (for Iuda posted before to giue him notice thereof) hee went out to meete him, and incountered him neere to a towne called Heros, who was seased with such extreame and vnexpected ioy, that he had almost expired; but Ioseph recoforted him, being himself almost endangered thorow extreame ioy, yet not in such extasie & extremitie as his father: afterwards desiring him to march softly onward, he taking with him his siue brethren halted vnto the King, signifying vnto him that his father with all his family were arriued. VVho no sooner vnderstood therof, but that he ioyfully asked Ioseph in what studies he tooke delight: who answered him that his exercise was keeping of cattell, and that he had no other trade. And this answer made he to the intent they might not be diuided one from another, but that liuing altogether, they might take care of their father: another reason was, least emulation should happen betwixt them and the Egyptians, if so be they should be conuerted in the same studies; for it was not lawfull for that nation to exercise the shepheards trade. Now when Iacob was brought into the Kings presence, and after he had done him reuerence, and prayed God for the prosperity both of him and his Realme; Pharao asked him how long he had liued: and when he vnderstood that he was a hundred and thirtie yeares old, he admired at the age of the man: and after he had certified him that his ancestors had liued farre longer time, he commaunded him and his sonnes to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the kings shepheards had their pastures. But the famine increased in Egypt, and the euill augmented more and more, by reason that Nilus did not ouerflow the earth, neither extended his armes ouer the same: on the other side God rained not vpon the earth: moreouer in that the euill was vn suspected, it was more grievous especially to the communitie, who had laid vp nothing, neither did Ioseph giue them corne without readie money; which when they began to want, they exchanged their cattell and slaues for corne; but they that had lands, sold a certaine portion thereof vnto the king for their prouision. And when as by this means all these possessions came into the kings hands; they went to inhabite the one heere, the other there, so the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their land: the sacrificers onely were excepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained intire. Finally, this necessitie reduced both the bodies & minds of the whole nation into seruitude after such a manner, that they esteemed no labour or meanes vnseemely, that might serue them towards the maintenance of their sustenance. But when the famine ceased, & the earth watered by the ouerflow of the flood, began to regather her former fertility; Ioseph visiting euery city of the kingdom, & assembling the multitude in euery one of them, restored them the profits of those lands which they had sold vnto the king, & exhorted them to manure the same in no worse manner then they would do their owne, commaunding them to pay the fift part vnto the King, which was due vnto him by his prerogative & kingly right. VVho reioicing at this vnexpected restitution, earnestly intended and prosecuted their tillage: and by this means not only Iosephs authoritie, but also the peoples hearts were not a little tied vnto the King: and the inheritance of the fift part of the profits remained with the Kings that succeeded and all their posteritie.

But Iacob after hee had liued seuentene yeares in Egypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his sonnes, hauing first besought God to giue them prosperitie and abundance, and prophesied that euery one of their posteritie should attaine to the possession of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to passe. Besides, praising his sonne Ioseph for that forgetting the iniuries done vnto him, he had bestowed diuers benefits on his brethren, yea and such as well befemed his benefactors; he commaunded his sonnes, that they should admit Iosephs sons Ephraim and Manasses into their number, at such time as they should diuide the land of Chanaan, M as hereafter it shall be declared. Last of all, he praised them to burie him in Hebron. And he died at such time as he had liued one hundred and fiftie yeares wanting three, being second to none of his ancestors in pietie, and obtained the reward which he ought iustly to possesse, in that hee was a man adorned with so many vertues. But Ioseph by the Kings permission went and transported his fathers bodie into Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But his brothers fearing to returne with him, and refusing to follow him, in that they suspected their father being dead dead, that he would be reuenged on them in that they had not any friend left aliue, vnder whose fauour they might hope for pardon, he commaunded them, that laying their suspicions aside they should suspect no euill: and hauing brought them backe againe with him, he gaue them great possessions; neither did he euer intermit to entertaine the with brotherly kindnes. But he likewise died, when he had liued one hundred and ten yeares; a man endowed with admirable vertue, and prudent in all affaires, and moderate in his gouernment: by which meanes it came to passe that neither his forraigne birth, neither his calamities whereof we haue spoken, did any wayes hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignitie. The rest of his brothers also, hauing spent their liues in happines, died in AEgypt, whose bodies their sonnes and nephewes transported and buried in Hebron: but Iosephs bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrewes into Chanaan, at such time as they departed out of Egypt into Chanaan: for hereunto had he bound them by oath. But in that I am to declare this, and other actions of this Nation, I will first of all shew the cause why they departed out of Egypt.

CHAP. V.

Of the affliction which the Hebrewes endured in Egypt, for the space of foure hundred yeares.

He AEgyptians are a Nation addicted vnto delicacie, and impatient of labour, subiect onely to their pleasures, and affecting gaine: whence it came to passe, that bearing hatred toward the Hebrewes, and enuying their happines, they were very euilly disposed towards them. For seeing the race of the Israelites flourish and to abound in riches, which they got by their labour and industrie, they conceiued an opinion that their aduancement & increase, would be the ouerthrow & decreafe of the AEgyptians; so that at length they forgot the benefits which Ioseph had done vnto them: and after the royaltie was transported into another familie, they committed diuers outrages against the Israelites, and comploted against them in what manner they might more grieuouly afflict them. For they were inioyned by them to cut Nilus into diuers trenches, and to enuiron their Cities with walles, and to build fortifications and banks, whereby the inundations of the flood might be diuerted. They also vexed our nation in building their hie and vaine Pyramides, compelling them to learne diuers artes, and to accustome themselves to endure labour; and in such afflictions led they their liues for the space of 400. yeares, the AEgyptians studying nought else but to tire the Israelites with continuall labour, and our country men endeavouring themselves alwaies to performe far more, then was expected from them. Liuing thus in this estate, there grew afterwards an other occasion, which infligated them the more to seeke the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the sacred secretaries (to whose predictions those kind of people do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be one bred & borne amongst the Israelites, that in time to come should grieuouly afflict the estate of the AEgyptians, and wonderously enhance the good hap of the Israelites; who should surpassse all other in vertue, and purchase to himselfe immortall glory, if so be he should attaine to mans estate. VVherewith the King being greatly terrified, he published an edict by the aduise of this secretary, that whatsoever male child should be borne amongst the Israelites, he should be cast into the flood to be drowned: hee commaunded likewise the AEgyptian midwiues diligently to obserue the time when the Hebrew women travelled with child, carefully to keepe & marke their children at such time as they were deliuered. For he was inioyned the that they should be brought to bed by such midwiues, who by reason of consanguinitie with that Nation, should not transgresse the kings commaundement. He enacted also a law with a penaltie, that if any should be so bold to conceale their children, both they and all their family should be done to death. Great was this their calamity, not onely in that respect, because they were deprived of their children, & for that the parents themselves were made the ministers to murder their owne children; but foreseeing also the future time they were intolerably dismayed, expecting nought else but the certaine and fatall extirpation of their whole nation, by reason that when the children were slaine, the parents themselves not long after were assured to die: thus conceited they in themselves into what extreame misfortune they were fallen. But no man whosoeuer, although he complot neuer so many stratagems, can resist the wil of God. For both the child, of whom the sacred secretary had foreprophecied, was secretly brought vp vnder the name of Amarames an Hebrew borne & a noble man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publike perill, lest the whole nation should be brought to nothing thorow the want of issue, and his owne private misfortune, whose wife at home was big with child and readie to lye downe; was troubled in his minde, and vncertaine what to doe. For which cause he made his recourſe vnto God, beſeeching him that at the length he would haue mercy on thoſe men of whom onely hee had bene perpetually honoured; and that it would pleaſe him to bring to end the preſent affliction which threatened the whole nation with vtter ruine and deſtruction. But God being moued vnto mercy by his moſt humble prayer appeared to him in a dreame, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the pietie of his aunces- tors, and that he would for euer remunerate them, euen as in times paſt he had bene gracious to their forefathers. For it was he that had increaſed their poſteritie, and multiplied them to ſo mighty a nation, that by his fauor, Abraham departing alone out of Meſopotamia into Chanaan, beſides other felicities, had iſſue by his wife that was before time barren, & left ample poſſeſſions to his ſucceſſors: to Iſmael, Arabia; to Chaturas children Trogloctida, & to Iſaac Chanaan. Neither can you euer forget without note of impietie and ingratitude, the attempts alſo which were hap- pily atchieued in warre by my meanes: but Jacobs name alſo is renowned amongſt forraine na- tions, both in reſpect of the felicitie wherein he liued, & alſo for that proſperitie which by heredi- tary right happened vnto his poſteritie, who taking their originall from 70. men that accom- panied their father into Egypt, are now increaſed to the number of ſixe hundreth thouſand: know therefore now alſo, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publike ſecuritie, and priuately thy glory. For this child, for feare of whoſe natiuitie the Egyptian: haue condemned all your chil- dren vnto death, ſhall be borne vnto thee: he neither ſhall be diſcouered by the conſtituted ſpies, and after he hath eſcaped beyond all expectation, ſhall he be brought vp, and in his time ſhall I he deliuer the Hebrewes from the thraldome of the Egyptians, and ſhall obtaine an eternall me- morie, for this famous action, not onely amongſt his owne nation, but alſo amongſt ſtraun- gers: for this fauour will I extend vnto thee, and on thy poſteritie that followeth after thee; he ſhall alſo haue ſuch a brother who ſhall deſerue both in himſelfe, and in his poſteritie to inhe- rite the prieſthood for euer. After theſe things were declared in a viſion vnto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Jochebel, and by reaſon of the prediction of this dreame, their ſuſpicion and feare the rather increaſed more and more: for they were not onely penſiue in reſpect of their child, but alſo by reaſon of the future great good fortune that was promiſed them. But anone after the woman being brought a bed, gaue credit to the Oracle; who had ſo eaſie and gentle a labour, that ſhe beguiled the ouerſeers & ſpies, in that ſhe felt none of thoſe throes which do common- ly afflikt ſuch as are in labor: ſo that the nourished the infant three moneths ſecretly in her houſe, without being in any ſort diſcouered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be ſurpriſed, & ſore doub- ting leaſt he ſhould incur the kings diſpleaſure, if the matter were diſcouered, whereby both he and the child ſhould be made away, and Gods promiſes ſhould be fruſtrate; he had rather whol- ly commit the ſafety of his ſonne to his providence: ſuppoſing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troubleſom vnto him to liue in co- tinuall perill both of his owne and his ſonnes ſafetie: moreover, he thought that God would pur- uey ſome meanes of aſſurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be proued falſe. Grounding himſelfe on this reſolution, they prepared and made a cradle of ſedge, after the manner of a couch, ſo great as it was ſufficient to lay the child in at eaſe, and hauing pic- tured it on euery ſide leaſt the water ſhould pierce the ſame, they put the child into it, and ſuffered him to float along the ſtreame in committing him to the mercy of God. Whileſt in this manner it was borne downe by the ſtreame, Mariam, the ſiſter of the young infant, by her mothers com- mand went along the banke on the other ſide of the riuer, obſeruing whither at length the baſ- ket would be caried, and where it did arriue. At that time God manifeſtly declared, that nothing is atchieued by mans wiſedome, but that all things are brought to paſſe by his omnipotent boun- tie, and that they who for their profit and particular ſecuritie ſeek the ruine and deſtruction of others with neuer ſo much ſubtiltie, care, and diligence, yet are they often times deceiued in their expectations: againe, that they that ſubmit their wils vnto Gods will, are warranted from all wrongs by ſuch meanes as were neuer thought on; which may moſt manifeſtly be perceiued by M this child.

instantly pursued them; and supposing it a cowardly part in them, not to take the benefite of their present good fortune, and conceiuing an assured hope of conquering Egypt, they generally wasted the same: and hauing tasted of the sweetnesse of pillage, without any temper or moderation in their victorie, they were incensed to attempt greater matters. And whereas they perceived, that hauing wasted all their neighbour regions, no man durst fully out to encounter them in armes, they marched forward toward Memphis, euen vnto the sea, arriuing neere no Citie that either had the heart, or durst make head against them. By which calamities the Egyptians being ouerfore oppressed, they send one to take counsell of the Oracle, in what manner they might preuent their miseries; and when as an answer was giuen them, that they should chooseth an Hebrew to assit them in the warres: the king commanded his daughter to giue them Moses, who together with the Empire, might gouerne the whole armie. She taking an oath of the king, that no iniurie or violence should be offered him, deliuered him into his hands; esteeming it to bee a great good fortune for Moses, that he was called to the succours of her countrey: and contrariwise the blamde the sacrificers, who were not ashamed to demanda his aid and assistance, whom they had foreiudged, and adiudged to be slaine as their common enemy. But Moses exhorted by Thermuthis and the king, willingly tooke the charge vpon him. Whereat the Priests of both nations were verie ioyfull; for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had overcome their enemies, they afterwards might more easily dispatch and murder him, by some treason and sinister meanes: and the Hebrewes conceiued a hope, that they might depart out of Egypt, by reason that Moses was the Generall of the armie. Moses therefore making haste, before such time as the enemies had any notice that he was dislodged, he leued his army, and conducted them, not along the banks of the riuer, but through the maine land, wherein he made manifest his most admirable prudence. For the iourney by land being very dangerous, by reason of the multitude of serpents (for the countrey thereabouts breedeth vpall sorts of them, and some of that kind, as the like thereof are not seene in any place else, all different in proprietic, malignitie, and horrible forme: and amongst these likewise there are some winged, and apt to fly, who not only offend those that they encounter on the earth very priuily, but also tower verie high in the aire, who houer about to hurt those that are not aware of them) he for the securitie of his armie, and to the end he might march without any inconuenience, inuented this marueilous and admirable stratageme. For he caused two paniers of sedge to be made, in forme of cofers, and filled them with certaine birds which were called Ibes, who are mortall enemies to serpents, and before whom the serpents flee: and sometimes in flying from them like Harts, they are laid hold of, and swallowed by them. Otherwise these birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmefull to any but to serpents, of whom I will now cease to write any further, because the Greekes doe already know what kind of bird it is.

When as therefore he arriued in the countrey of serpents, hee let flie his Ibes against the venomous beasts, and made vse of them to encounter the other: and when hee had marched in this sort, he attained and surprised the Ethiopians, before they suspected him; and sodainly charging them, he ouercame them in battell, spoiling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt; and entring the townes of Ethiopia, hee rased them, and made a great slaughter of the inhabitants. The Egyptian armie hauing tasted the happie successe that happened vnto them vnder the conduct of Moses, intermitted not their occasion, especially for that they saw that the Ethiopians were welnigh conquered, or rather wholly destroyed: and in the end hauing driuen them euen vnto Saba, the chiefe citie of Ethiopia (which Cambyfes called Meroe, for the loue which he bore vnto his sister, who was so called) they besieged them. The Citie was strong, and verie hard to be assailed, by reason of the riuer Nilus, which enuironed it round about: on the other side, the riuers of Astapus and Astaborra did flow in so freshly, as they could neither breake the course of the water, nor wade ouer the streame: for the citie is builded in an Island, inuironed with a strong wall round about, hauing great rampiers betwix the riuers and the walles built, to resist the inundations of the waters; which are the cause that the Citie may be very hardly taken, although the opposite armie had found meanes to passe the water. Now when Moses was verie foregriued that his armie profited nothing, by reason that the enemies durst not encounter them in open field; beheld what a chance happened: Tharbis the daughter of the king of Ethiopia beholding Moses, at such time as he approached with his armie neere vnto the walles of the Citie, and seeing how valiantly he fought and behaued himselfe, and wondering at the exploits and enterprises which he made (which was the cause that the Egyptians, almost despairing of their estates and libertie, were growne so forward; and how the Ethiopians, not long before esteem-med the conquerers, and happie in their warlike exploits and fortunate executions, were in the greatest extremitie of daunger) shee was surprised with his loue: and for that this passion augmented more and more in her, she sent vnto him seauen of her most faithfull and householde seruants to offer him her loue, and intreat with him of marriage. The which hee accepted, vnder that condition that she should deliuer the Citie into his hands, promising her vnder a solemne oath, that at such time as he were master thereof, he would take her to wife without falsifying or breach of his promise. The matter was no sooner motioned, but the effect followed; so that hauing surprised & conquered the Ethiopians, and after he had giuen thanks vnto God, Moses accomplished the marriage, and sent the Egyptians backe againe into their countrey. Who conceiued an occasion of hatred against Moses, because he had bin the cause of their safetie; and began seriously to consule and deuise amongst themselves, how they might betray him, suspecting least he by reason of the happy successe he had had, should begin to quicken and reuiue some alterations in Aegypt: they accused him therefore of murder before the king, who already of himselfe had him in suspicion, as well in respect of the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, during such time as he was Generall, as also for the feare he had conceiued of the destruction of Aegypt foretold by his priests, who incessantly incited him against Moses, so that the king was vpon the point to lay hands on him and murder him.

But he hauing intelligence of those his practises, escaped and fled secretly, flying from his presence thorow the desert, by which the enemies least suspected that he should haue fled: and although at no place in his iourney hee found victuals to sustaine him, yet ouercame hee his penury by his patience. And arriuing neere a Citie of the Madians, situate vpon the shoare of the red sea (that was named by one of Abraham and Cheturas sonnes) he sat him downe neere vnto a fountaine refreshing himselfe, and taking his ease after his laborious iourney: for it was about noonefest, and the Citie already appeared in his sight. In this place there befell an occasion vnto him, deriued from the manners and custome of liuing, among the inhabitants of the countrey; by which he both expressed his vertue, and found an opportunitie to better his estate. For whereas that Region is foretrauailed with want of water, the shepherds had a custome to strue which of them should first possesse the pits, for feare lest the water should bee quite consumed by others, before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirst. To this fountaine therefore there came seauen virgins, which were sisters and daughters of Raguel the Priest, whom the inhabitants of that place held in great estimation, who had the charge to attende their fathers flockes, for that it is the exercise wherein the Troglodites are wont to exercise their women. These hasted themselves to draw sufficient water for their troupes into the troughes, expressly made to receive the water; and when in the mean time the shepherds came and surprised them, and droue away the virgins, to the end they might be masters of the water: Moses supposing it a matter vnworthy his honour, to suffer this outrage, and to indure that by violence men should depriue virgins of their right and interest; he droue away the shepherds, who would haue enioyed that which appertained not vnto them, and gaue necessary succours to the dismayed maydens. Who as soone as they were returned into their fathers presence, tolde him the outrage that was done them by the shepherds, and the succours that they found by the handes of a stranger, beseeching him that the courtelie which hee had shewen vnto them, should not bee forgotten, but that in some sort hee might receiue recompence. The father commending his daughters thankfulness towards their benefactor, commaunded them to bring Moses into his presence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deserued. As soone as hee came into his presence, Raguel told him how his daughters had giuen him to vnderstand, how kindly he had assisted them: and hauing his vertue in admiration, he said that he had not aduentured himselfe, nor done kindnesse to those that were without sense of the curtesies that were shewed vnto them, but vnto those who were capable to giue him thanks, yea so ready to requite him, that the greatnesse of their requittall should farre surpass the measure of his humanitie. Hee therefore adopted him for his sonne, and gaue him one of his daughters to wife, and made him superintendent and master of his flockes (in which in times past the wealth and riches of foraine nations consisted.) Moses hauing obtained this good fortune at Tethiglaus hands (for such was *Raguel*s surname) he abode there with him and attended his flockes. But not long after he led his cattell to graze neere to the mountaine Sinai, which is the highest of all those that are in that quarter, and good for pasturage, by reason of the hollesome herbes that grow thereabouts: which notwithstanding was not fed vpon before that time, because the shepherds durst not frequent thereabouts, by reason of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey, who said that God inhabited bited that in mountaine: there happened there vnto him a maruailous prodigie, which was, that G a flame of fire seemed round about him in a bush, without offending either the greene herbes, or the flowers, or the boughes charged with fruit, although the flame were both great and vehement. He not a little amazed at this vncexpected spectacle, at last grew more and more amazed when as he heard a voice issuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accusing him of boldnes, in that he was not afraid to tread vpon that ground, which hitherto was vnaccessable, and religiously reuerenced, and vnhaunted by men; counselling him that he should depart as far off from the flame, and content himselfe with that vision: for although that hee were a vertuous man, and descended from great personages, yet that he ought not to bee curious to make further search into the same. The same voyce also told him, that the honour and glorie which he obtained amongst men, was by the assistance of God, charging him to be of good courage, and to repaire into Egypt, for that in that place hee should bee capitaine and guide of the Hebrew nation, and should deliuer that people which were therein, from the outrage & seruitude which they suffered. For (saide the voyce) they shall inhabit this happie countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they shall enioy all sorts of blessings vnder the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover it commaunded him, that hauing brought the Hebrewes out of Egypt, he should offer sacrifice of thanksgiuing, at such time, as hee should arrive againe in that place. And such was the Oracle which hee received from out of the flame. Moses altogether rauished at that which he had both heard and seene, spake thus: O Lord, it were madnes in me, and no prudence, if I should distrust thy power the which I reuerence, and which as I know hath been manifested vnto my predecessors: notwithstanding I stand in doubt how I, who am a man of no eloquence, and of lesse force, should perswade my brethren by my words, to forsake the coun-trei wherein they inhabit, to follow me into that countrey whither I will conduct them: And although they should be perswaded to doe the same; how can I force Pharao to permit them to depart from thence, by whose labours and trauels, the Egyptians are dayly increased in goods and riches? Wherevpon God gaue him to vnderstand, that he should take vpon him a good courage, and promised him, that he himselfe would assist him, and that if hee had need of eloquence, he would bestow vpon him the facultie of perswasion; or if he were driuen to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding that in confirmation of those promises he had made him, he should let fall his staffe vpon the ground: which hauing done, a Dragon began to creepe vpon the ground, and in turning and rouling himselfe, lifted vp his crest on high; making semblance to defend himselfe against those that should assaile him: and againe, a little while after became a staffe againe. Afterwards he commaunded him to put his hand into his bosome: and no sooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, & in colour resembling chalk: & a little while after it recovered his ordinary forme. Moreover, hee further willed him to draw water out of the next well, and to poure it on the ground, and hee saue it turned into a bloudie colour. Amazed at these accidents, hee was commaunded to bee of good courage, and assured that he should haue great assistance. Moreover, that he should vse these signes before all men, to the end (saith God) that all may belieue that being sent by me, thou doost all this according to my commandements. Furthermore I enioyne thee, that without any further delay, thou haste thee into Egypt; and that thou trauell day and night, without leessing time, without delaying any more to succour the poor Hebrewes grievously afflicted in Egypt. Moses hauing no cause to distrust that which God had promised him, and being confirmed by these things whereof he was both an eye-witnesse, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occasion to expresse the like power in Egypt, he would vouchsafe to further the effect; beseeching him further that he would not conceale his name from him, to whome hee had participated the hearing of his voice, and the sight of his presence; that it might please him therefore to declare vnto him his name, to the end that when he should offer sacrifice vnto him, he might call vpon the same. God declared vnto him his name, which before time had bene concealed amongst men, and of which also it is not lawfull for me to speak. Moses wrought these signes not only at that time, but also when or whersoever he thought it requisite: by all which hee gaue further credit to the fire M which had appeared vnto him, and assured himselfe that God would be his fauourable defender, that he would deliuer his brethren, and inangle and enwrap the Egyptians in great calamities.

And after that he had vnderstood that Pharao King of Egypt was dead (during whose life hee suffered from thence) hee requested Raguel that hee would giue him leaue to depart into Egypt, for the profit of those of his nation; and taking with him Sephora (who was Raguel's daughter and his married wife) and Gerson and Elezar his children, which he had by her, hee departed to

A go into Egypt. Now this name of Gerson in the Hebrew tongue signifieth, Forrain: and Elezar signifieth, fauoured by God, in memory that Moses had escaped from amongst the Egyptian-ans, by the assistance of the God of his fathers; And as he approached neere the mountaines, Aron his brother by the commandement of God came forth to meete him, to whome he declared all that which had happened vnto him in the mountaine, and that which God had giuen him in charge. And as they passed onward of their way, the men of greatest estimation amongst the Hebrewes (hauing intelligence of his coming) came out to meete him, to whom Moses presented the abouenamed tokens, by reason that he could not perswade them by words: and they being astonished at that which they had seene him doe, beyond their expectation; waxed confidente, and conceived a good hope of all things; seeing that God had a care of their safetie. When B he perceived that the Hebrewes were readie to obey him, and that they protested to follow him in all that which he should command them, through the earnest desire they had to be at liberty: he presented himselfe before the king, who had newly vnderaken the government, and shewed him the great benefites he had done vnto the Egyptians, at such time as they were despised by the Ethiopians, who had spoiled all their countrey; and how he had spared no triuall, but sustained all the charge of the warre; as if it had bene waged for his owne proper nation. On the other side, he opened vnto him the dangers which he had iniustly suffered for his recompence: he afterwards discoursed vnto him that which had befallen him neere vnto the fountaine of Sinai and the talke which God had in that place with him, and the signes in particular which had been shewed vnto him, in confirmation of those things whereunto hee was enioined; exhorting the C King not to mistrust or impeach the ordinance of God. The King hearing this, began to mocke him: but Moses made him see in effect the signes, which were shewed vnto him neere to the moun-taine of Sinai. But the King waxed wroth, and grievously reuiled him, accusing him for that in times past he fled away for feare to bee slaine in Egypt, and at this present returned thither vnder a subtill pretext, cloaking his craft with magike, and enchantment, the more to affright him.
And at the same instant hee called into his presence the Priests of Egypt; to let them see those signes, and to make it manifest that the Egyptians were exercised in those Sciences: and that hee onely was not maister in those things, the which he boasted to perform by Gods power, but that they were but deceits & shadowes of meruailes to deceiue the multitude: whereupon the Priests cast downe their rods, and they became serpents. Moses being nothing moued herewith, sayd: D O King, I despise not the wisdom of the Egyptians, but I protest that that which I haue done, doth so farre surpass the their magike and art, as there is difference betwene diuine and humane things: I will therefore shewe you, that that which I do, is not by enchantment, nor vnder colour of apparent verity, but by the prouidence and power of God. This saide, hee cast his rod vpon the ground, commaunding it to change it selfe into a serpent: whereunto it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it deuoured all the rods of the Egyptians which seemed to be serpents, vntill they were all of them consumed; and that done, Moses tooke his staffe into his hand againe, and it reassumed his pristine forme. But the king being neuer the more astonished, (but the rather incensed at that which was done) said, that this wisdom and subtilty of Moses should profit him nothing, which hee vsed in disgrace of the Egyptians. He commaunded therefore the E ouerseer of the works, who had the government ouer the Hebrewes, that hee should remit nothing of their labour, but that he should oppresse them with more tedious and greuous tasks, then they were wont to be put vnto: whereupon (where he was wont to allowe them strawe to make their tile with) he forbore after that time to giue them that allowance: and taxing them in the day time to follow their worke, he appointed them by night to find and bring in their strawe, doubling thereby the waight of their former labour. Notwithstanding all this, Moses would neither desist from his purpose, in regard of the kings threatning, nor the continual cry of his countrimen, neither was in any sort appauled thereat; but with a confident and vnappauled mind (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to restore his countrymen to their desired libertie. He therefore once againe accosted the King, perswading him to dismiss the Hebrewes; to the end F they might repaire vnto the mountaine Sinai, and sacrifice vnto God in that place: for no lesse (saith he) hath he commanded, neither can any resist his will. For which cause he aduiled the King to indeuour himselfe (least hee should seeme to contemne his fauours) to grant the people free passage; for feare least if he should secretly forbid them the same, he might accuse and condemne himselfe to suffer that which they in reason ought to endure, who resist the wil and works of God: for to those that stir vp the wrath of God against themselves, all kind of mishaps do flock and flow on euery side: The earth befriendeth them not: neither smileth the ayre vpon them, their children are not begotten according to nature; but all things oppose themselves as enemies and contraries against them. Moreouer he added, that the Egyptians should feele the plague, after that the people of the Hebrews should (in despite of their resistance) depart out of their country: but in that the King despised these words of Moses, and would not be conuerted, most grievous plagues fell vpon the land of Aegypt. (The which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Egyptians suffered those things, which neuer before that time happened to any other people; and for that cause likewise that I may testifie and declare, that Moses hath not falsified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and besides, for that it is expedient for men to learne & do those things which are agreeable to gods wil, for feare least he being prouoked and incensed against them, should punish them for their vniustice.) For first of all by the commandement of God, the riuers overflowed with blood, neither was it possible for them to drinke (notwithstanding they had no other fountaines of water) neither was the water only coloured like blood, but when as likewise any one drank thereof, it ingendered & procured in him diuers docters, and grievous gripings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrewes it seemed good and sweet in taste, without any waies changing the nature thereof.

Hereupon the King (not knowing what to doe, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid by reason of the Egyptians) permitted the Hebrewes to depart: but no sooner was this plague ceased, but he presently chaunged his mind, and would not permit them liberty to depart: for which cause God (seeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned, notwithstanding hee had deliuered him from the former calamity) hee inflicted an other plague vpon the Egyptians. He therefore sent an infinite number of frogs vpon them, that covered and infected the whole country, and the riuers were so packed and stored with them in such manner, that they that drew water to drinke, found it altogether infected with the putrefaction of them, dying & rotting in the waters: so that the whole country was full of filthy mud, by reason of the frogs that defaced & died on the same. They corrupted also their meats, mingling themselves in their houses amidst their meat and drink, & creeping amidst their chambers; from whence an odious stench exhaled by reason of the multitude of frogs that lay dead. Now when the Aegyptians saw themselves so sore pressed with these euils, the King commanded Moses that he should take the Hebrewes, & that he should depart: and as soone as he had spoken this, the multitude of frogs vanished and appeared no more, neither on the earth nor in the water, but that they remained their accustomed nature. No sooner was the earth deliuered from this curse, but Pharao forgot the cause thereof, & retained the Hebrewes anew: & (as if he had a desire to experimēt the maner of diuers miseries) he denied that issue which before time he had granted them, rather inforced them unto by his feare, then forward good liking. For this cause God once againe rewarded his fraud, by sending him another plague: for a multitude of lice swarmed from the bodies of the Aeg-yptians, whence the wretched men perished wretchedly; neither could they exterminate that race, either by bathings or inunctions. The king troubled with this calamity, & fearing the ruine of his people, and bethinking him of the shamefull end thereof, he was constrained to remit the better part of his malignitie. For as touching the Hebrewes he permitted them to depart, but (after the plague was appeased) he required at their hands that they would leaue their wiues and children behind them for pledges till their returne: and by this meanes he prouoked Gods wrath more heauily against him, in that he supposed to delude his prouidence: as if it had not been God, who (in the Hebrewes behalfe) had punished them, but Moses that had plagued the Aegyptians. For God filled their country with many and diuers sorts of beasts, (the like whereof before that time had not bene seene in that country) which killed them vp, so that the earth became desolate and vnumanured, and if any one amongst them escaped from death, they were afterwards destroyed by sickness. But notwithstanding all these, the King still continued obstinate in his wickednes, and disobedient vnto God, permitting onely that the women and men should depart, & that their children should be left behind them: but God desisted not to punish such as were dispersed ouer all the people.

For their bodies were grievously tormented with vlcers, and corrupted inwardly; and after this sort the greater part of the Egyptians perished: but when as the King was neither moderated, nor mollified by this plague, God rained downe haile vpon them (which neuer before that time was engendred in the ayre of Egypt; & further so great, or rather greater then that, which falleth to the Northward, neere to the Poie Artique in the midst of the spring) and spoiled all their fruit. After which an army of grasshoppers deuoured all those buds and fruits which were vnoffenced.

A offenced by the hayle; so that all the hope which the Egyptians had of their harvest or fruites, was utterly ouerthrowne. These aforesaid afflictions had bene sufficient to perswade a man of the meanest wit (except he had bene a reprobate) to grow wise, and make vie of that which was most profitable for him. But Pharao knowing the causes of the same, enforced himselfe to resist God, not onely thorow imprudence, but for malice; so that voluntarily hee betrayed his commonweale. He therefore commaunded Moses, that hee should lead away the Hebrewes with their wiues; but that they should leaue their substance behind them for a prey, in that they complained, that after all these calamities they had nothing left them. To whom Moses answered, that hee demaunded an vnlawfull matter, by reason that they were to offer sacrifice vnto God of their prey or bootie. Now while the time was spent in these consultations, darknesse altogether deuoyd of light ouerspread the land of Aegypt, wherethrough they died miserably in closing their eyes, by reason of the thicknesse thereof, so that they were afraid least the fogge should choake them: which being dispersed, after three dayes, and so many nights, Moses seeing that Pharao would not repent, nor let the people of Israel depart, hee came vnto him, and spake after this manner. As long as you shall resist the ordinance of God (who commaundeth you to suffer the Hebrewes to depart) there is no meanes, whereby you may be exempted from these mischiefes in doing that which you doe. The King enraged at these wordes, threatned him to cut off his head, if once more hee durst appeare in his presence, to motion vnto him any such matter. Moses answered him, that he would no more speake vnto him as touching this matter; but that both himselfe, and the chiefeft among the Egyptians would exhorre the He-brewes to depart: which said, he forsooke his presence. But God intending to expresse that he meant yet once more to plague the Egyptians, and to constraime them to deliuer the He-brewes: he commaunded Moses to declare vnto the people, that they should haue their sacrifice in a readinesse, and hauing prepared it the thirteenth day of the moneth Zanthichus, to celebrate the same the 14. of the said moneth (by the Egyptians called Pharmuth, and by the He-brewes Nisan, and Zanthicus by the Macedonians) and that hee should lead forth all the He-brewes, bearing with them all their goods. Whereupon hee who had the Hebrewes already in a readinesse to depart, and had distributed them by families, kept them in one place, and in the same order: but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (addressed to depart) made sacrifice, and with the blood of the lambe purged their houses, besprinkling them with branches of Ilope. And after they had supped, they burned the flesh that remained, as being on the point to address themselves to depart. Whereupon even at this day wee retaine the said custome to sacrifice in like sort; and do call this solemnitie Pascha, which is as much to say, as the passage, by reason that on that day God leauing and ouerpasing the Hebrewes without harme, strooke the Egyptians with sickness: for that plague in the night time cut off all the first begotten in Aegypt, so that by multitudes they that dwelt round about the palace, assembled them in the presence of the King, and besought him to let the Hebrewes goe: for which cause Pharao calling for Moses, gaue order that they should depart the country, supposing that as soone as they were gone, Aeg-ypt should no more be afflicted with such like plagues. Moreouer, they honoured the Hebrews with presents, partly to the end they should depart with the more expedition, partly for the neighbourhood and acquaintance sake which they had one with another. And as they departed the Egyptians wept, and repented them of the euill vsage they had shewed vnto them: but they tooke their way towards Latopolis at that time desert, & in which place afterwards Babylon was builded, at such time as Cambyses destroyed Aegypt. The third day they came vnto Beelzephon neere vnto the red sea, and for that they wanted victuals by reason of the desert, they tempered their meale with water, and hardened it with a little heate, and made cakes, with which they sustained themselves for the space of thirtie dayes: for they had not brought any more victuall out of Aegypt, but as much as would serue them for that time, & that which they had they dispensed verie sparingly, rather feeding for necessitie, then eating with frietie. For which cause in memorie of that want, wee celebrate a feast for the space of eight daies, which we call the feast of Azymes, that is to say, of vneleavened bread. But it is not easie, to number the multitude of them that dislodged, if wee consider the women and children; but of those that were of full age, and fit to beare armes, they were in number fixe hundred thousand.

likewise composed an Ode in Hexameter verse, containing the prayes of God, and a thanksgiv-

CHAP. I.

How Moses conducted the people out of Aegypt to the Mountaine of Sinai.

His new and vnexpected deliuerance of the Hebrewes from their daunger, The Israelites was not a little obscured by the wearinesse and tediousnesse of their iourney, with a star which they indured in their trauell towards the mountaine of Sinai: by reason are distressed son that the countrey was desert and inhabitable, destitute of victualls, and for want of and wholly depriued of waters; and not onely barren of that which serued for water the sustenance of men, but also euerie wayes destitute of pasturage and pro-uision for cattell: for it was not onely drie and utterly destitute of water, but also de-priued of all meanes to nourish and increase fruite. Now they were inforced to prosecute their way thorow this countrey, by reason they could not otherwise chuse; so that they were constrained to beare with them the water which they had drawn before such time as they entered the desert, according as their Captaine and Conductor had commanded them: which being spent, they digged pits, out of which they drew water with great difficultie, by reason of the sterility of the countrey: and further, the water which they found in those places was bitter, & no waies fit to drinke, and that which was worse, very little in quantitie. Trauailing onwards of their iourney after this manner, they arrived about the euening in a certaine place, which by reason the waters thereabout were brackish, they called Mara, that is to say, bitterness: there waiting with their trauell and their provision failing them, they began to be trauailed with necessity, Mara signifi-so that they resolved to stay in that place; and the rather in that they found a certaine pit there, eth bitternes. which although it were insufficient to satisfie so great an army, yet for that they found it in that countrey, it yielded them no little consolation. For they were giuen to vnderstand, that if they trauelled onwards they should find no water; and as touching the water of that pit, it was so bitter and vnfit for their drinking, that it neither was agreeable with mens taste, nor supportable by their very cattell likewise. Whereupon Moses seeing them so discomfited, neither knowing in what sort to satisfie them, in that he had not to deale with an opposit army or enemy to the end to enforce, and to repell them with valor; and for that he manifestly perceiued that not D onely a troupe of valiant men, but also a multitude of women and children were like to perish: he was very sore perplexed not knowing what to doe, and on himselfe he heaped the calamities of them all; as if himselfe onely were to beare the heavy burthen of their misery. For all of them had their recourse vnto him, and to no man else; the women besought for their children, the husbands intreated for their wiues, beseeching him to take compassion of their desolations, and to furnish them with some meanes to escape their miserie. He addressed himselfe therefore in most humble manner to beseech almighty God, that it might please him to conuert the euill qualitie of the water, and to make it potable: which grace and fauour he no sooner obtained, but he tooke the end of his staffe, and cast it at his feete, and afterwards brake it in the midst, and cleft it long waies, and cast it into the pit; giuing the Hebrewes to vnderstand, that God had E heard their prayers, and that he had promised them to giue them that water they desired, if so be they would obey him, and with alacritie and diligence performe that which should be commanded them. And when they were inquisitiue of that which they ought to do; to the intent the water might be changed, he enioyned euery one of them, that was of best strength and abilitie amongst them, to draw water; giuing them to vnderstand, that so soone as they had drawne out great store of water from the pit, the rest that should remaine, would be verie good and conuenient to be drunk: wherein they trauailed in such sort, that the water agitated and purified by often drawing, became potable, and refected the weary multitude. Hereupon dislodging from that place they came to Helim, a countrey that as farre off seemed very pleasant, by reason that it was planted with Palme trees; but the neerer they approached it, the more tedious they F found it (for there were no more than leauentie Palme trees in that place, and they not very tall or well growne, by reason of the driness and barrenesse of that countrey: for they were not watered by the fountaines, whereof there were twelue in that place, neither did any one of them yeeld any moysture, to giue them sustenance) so that endeavouring themselves to dig vp the sand they could light on no veines of water, and if perhaps any little deale appeared, it was so troubled by their digging as it became vnfit to be tasted: neither did the trees beare any store of fruit, by reason of the want of water. For which cause the whole multitude began to murmure against their guide, ascribing all the cause of their calamities and miseries vnto him. For hauing marched for the space of thirtie dayes, they had consumed all that which they brought with them, and conceiuing in their imagination that there was no remedy, they were wholly surprised with despair. Berhinking them therefore onely of that euill which was before their eyes, and forgetting the marueils which God by the ministerie and prudence of Moses had made them both see and partake, they conceiued hatred against him, and were ready to stone him to death, as if hee had bene the authour of that calamitie which oppressed them. But he perceiuing the multitude so enraged and incensed against him, strengthened himselfe in God: and warranted by the testimonie of a good conscience, and the vsprightnesse of his actions, hee came out into the midst of them; who reuiled him, and had gathered stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorned with a singular grace and alluring countenance, and endued with pleasing eloquence, & fit to pacifie the popularitie, he began to appease their wrath; exhorting them not onely to forget their present difficulties, but also to remember their forepassed blessings, not permitting that the trauell which they endured at that time, should drive out of their remembrance the graces and great good turnes, which they had receiued at Gods hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliuerance from that extremitie, by the prouidence of God, who (as it was very likely) made triall of their vertue, to see what perseuerance they had, or whether they kept in their remembrance those things which had hapned vnto them; or whether forgetting their forepassed pleasures, they would suffer themselves to be swallowed with their present miserie: hee willed them therefore to take heed, least through their impatience and ingratitude, they should be found vnworthie of Gods fauour; who both neglected his will, by whole direction they were brought out of Egypt, and sore threatened and hated him, which was Gods minister, especially since hitherto they might no wayes complaine of him in any thing, which hee had undertaken to execute by the commaundement of God. Then reckoned he vp particularly vnto them, how the Egyptians were ouerthrowne and afflicted, whilst contrarie to Gods will they endeouored to detainee them; how the same riuer which to them was bloudie and vnprofitable to drinke of, to themselves became both sweete and potable: likewise how the sea retired it selfe, and furthered both their flight and passage, wherein they saw themselves secure and free from danger: and contrariwise, their enemies destroyed, ouerthrowne and drowned; and how euen vntill that day being disarmed, they were by Gods prouidence both furnished and fortified abundantly. Againe, howe often God had deliuered them from apparant death and daunger, besides all mens opinion, who being all and alwayes omnipotent, gaue them at that time, no not the least suspicion of his assistance. For which cause they were to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselves that the succour, although it were deferred, was neuer too late, which was receiued before such time as the daunger had preuailed: and so to thinke that God condemned not their perils, but that he made triall of their fortitude and free loue, to see whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meate and drinke; or rather whether after the manner of brute beasts, they had leiser be trained in seruile trauell, to the end they might be glutted like them, and made the better able to endure their labor. To conclude, that hee nothing feared his life (because that being vnusfully slaine, no euill could happen vnto him) but that hee was fearefull of their safetie, least lifting vp their handes to stone him, they should bee thought to oppose themselves against Gods ordinance. Thus pacified hee them, and mollified the furie they had conceived to endanger his life; and so much preuailed hee, that they repented them of that enterprise, whereby they sought to indanger him. And for that he knew that they had some reason to be thus moued, he addressed himselfe to prayer and supplication: and ascending a certaine rocke, he required Gods helpe to relieue their infirmities, wants, and afflictions, in whose hands onely the situation of the people consisted, beseeching him in mercy to forgiue the people being exasperated with extreme miseries, and by reason thereof distracted & withdrawne from their dutie; whereupon God promised him to haue care of the people, assuring him to send them a speedie & present deliuerance. Which when Moses vnderstood, he came downe vnto the multitude; who perceiuing him altogether refreshed with ioy, by reason of those promises which he had receiued at Gods hands, exchanged their dolefull lamentations, into a habit of delight. He therefore standing vp in the midst of them, told them that he brought vnto them a most speedie remedie for their present necessitie: and not long after, a number of Quails (which about the gulfes of Arabia multiply and increase more then any other sorts of birds) flew and crossed the sea; and being wearied in their flight, and accustomedly accosting and flying neere

G to the ground, came and fell amidst the campe of the Hebrews: who caught them as a provision prepared for them by God, and ordained to extinguish their famine. Whereupon Moses once more addressed himselfe to call vpon God, yeelding him thanks for the present and the future good hee had promised him. Who being after this manner fed and refreshed, were presently supplied with a newe kind of food: for at such time as Moses stretched out his handes and prayed vnto God, a dewe descended from heauen that thickened betwix his handes, which for that he supposed it, to be another kind of sustenance sent them by God, hee tasted the same; and taking pleasure therein, for that the people knew not what it was, but thought it to be snowe which fell in that place, according to the season of the yeare, hee taught them that it was no dew falling from heauen as they supposed, but that God had sent them that grace for the conseruation and nouriture of their bodies; and hauing eaten thereof, he gaue them of it, to the end he might strengthen their beliefe: who tasting the same in like manner as their chiefe- taine had done, were greatly refreshed with the sustenance. For in sweetnes and pleasure it equalled the honie, in odour Bdellium, and in forme and greatnes the graine of a Coriander seede: of which euery one gathered, and by commaundement it was enioyned that euery one of them should particularly gather euery day the measure of an Assaron, which is the tenth part of an Ephra, to the end that no one should be scant of this food: which was done to that end, least the weaker should want, whilst the stronger thorow auarice should gather more then sufficed them. And if any one contrarie to the prescript commaunde, had gathered more then was permitted him, although he toyled and trauelled more then any of them, yet was his portion no waies increased by that meanes. For whatsoever (beside the appointed measure of the Assaron) remained till the next morning was of no value, thorow bitternes, and was putrefied thorow wormes: so diuine and admirable was this kind of foode, and of that nature, that who so had sufficient thereof, needed no other sort of sustenance. Moreouer euen in these our daies, al that countrey is bestrewed and bedewed with that kind of saliment, which God in fauour of Moses sent for the peoples sustenance. The Hebrewes call it Manna, for in our tongue Man is an interrogation, signifying what is that? Thus liued they then ioyfully, being sustained by this kind of meat sent them from heauen, and vsed the same for the space of fortie yeares; during that time which they liued in the desert. But afterwards when they were dislodged from that place, and encamped neere to Raphidim, they were extremely trauailed with thirst: where, vpon their first arriuall they found some few springs, but afterwards they found the land wholly destitute of water. They therefore once more were incensed against Moses: but he withdrawing himselfe apart from the furie of the people, conuerted himselfe vnto God in prayer, beseeching him that as he had giuen them foode in their necessitie, he would now also giue them drinke at that present, wherein they were welnie choaked with thirst, praying him to provide them of drinke also, or otherwise that their meat was vnprofitable to them; whereon God presently granted his prayer, promising Moses that he would giue him a fountaine and abundance of water from that place from whence hee least expected it. Hereon he commanded him, that striking vpon the rock with his rod, which was thereby hard at hand, he should from thence seeke that which they demanded and wanted, assuring him that euery one without trauell or labour should haue sufficient therefro: which counsaile when Moses had receiued from Gods hands, he returned vnto the people who expected him, and had their eyes fixed vpon him: for at that time they beheld him descending from the rocke where he had made his prayer. No sooner was he arriued, but he told them that God would in like sort deliuer them from that necessitie, and would graciously grant them an vnexpected reliefe; telling them that a fountaine should sodainly breake from the rocke: but they being amazed at that which they heard, and doubting least tired with thirst and trauelled by iourneies, they should be enforced to heue and cleaue the rocke: Moses strook the same in such sort with his rod, that he diuided it in sunder, and deliuered out most cleere and pure water in great abundance. The people were very sore astonished at this so strange accident: so that beholding the water, their thirst was quenched. They afterward drunke of the water, and found it verie sweet and pleasant, resembling in the goodnes of it, the diuine bountie & power of the giuer thereof. For this cause they highly esteemed Moses, seeing that God had honoured him in this sort, and they acknowledged Gods prouidence and their thankgiuing by their sacrifices, humbly thanking him for the care he had ouer them. The sacred scriptures likewise, which are kept and consecrated in the Temple, testifie that God had foretold Moses also that water should in this sort issue from the rocke.

How the Amalechites and their associates were overcome, and how great a prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

Exod. 17.
The Amalechites warre against the Israelites.

Moses encouraged the people to expect nothing else but victory.

Joshua made captain over the Israelites.

When the renoume of the Hebrewes waxed great, and was spread in the eares of all men (so as the brute thereof was heard in euerie part) it came to passe that the inhabitants of that countrey were in very great feare: whereupon (sending embassages the one vnto the other) they mutually incited themselues to expell and utterly ruinate the whole nation. Amongst the rest those of the countrey of Gobi, and the Citie Petra (who are called Amalechites, a nation verie warlike, and more active then the rest) were the chiefe agents in this expedition: whose Kings both encourage one another, and whetted their neighbour nations to the Israelites destruction; telling them that a forraigne army, flying from the thraldome of the Egyptians, had invaded their countrey, whose increas was not a little to be suspected: counselling them (before they had gathered head, and recovered more meanes, and a countrey to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident by reason of their forbearance) to charge them first; rather then to expect their increas, and so to oppresse them: esteeming it a better point of wisdom to repress their insolencie and forwardnes in the desert, then to expect whilst they were possessed of strong Cities, & rich meanes. For this (said they) is the part of wise men, to resist the vprisings and power of their aduersaries; and not to expect, whilst by daily exploits they more & more increas; & rather to provide to prevent, then deliuer themselves from perill. After these embassages, it was decreed by generall counsell, that they should endeavour to confront and assault the Hebrewes. These determinations and designs of theirs amazed and troubled Moses verie much, for that he expected no hostility. When therefore hee perceived that the people were affrighted, and amazed to see themselves (being wholly vnprovided) to be charged by so strong and well furnished an armie; hee recomfirmed them, and willed them to bethinke themselves of Gods promises, who by his power had set them at libertie; assuring them that they should overcome all those that made party and head against them to destroy them: wiling them to thinke, that though they were inferiour vnto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and such like; yet since they had God to friend, and readie to fight for them against their enemies, that they ought to conceiue such courage, as if they were furnished with far more then humane supplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant how great an assistent God was, hauing had so often triall of his goodnes in their greatest daungers, whom both hee knew to be anemie to their enemies, and fauourable to their proceedings: which fauour of his he most manifestly exprest, by his miraculous deliuerance of them from hunger and thirst, by yeelding them free escape when they were shut in by sea and mountaines; and that which should most animate them to the fight and victorie at that time was, that after this plunge they should want nothing that appertained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moses thus hauing encouraged the people by his words, he called vnto him the chiefe of the tribes, and euerie one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publike assembly; commaunding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their Generall. But they contemning their daunger, and desirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would proue the final end of their calamity: for which cause they instantly besought Moses to lead them forth against the enemy, praying him not to dull the alacritie of the soldiers, by any vntimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out amongst the whole multitude, such as were most fitte for warre) he chose Iosue the sonne of Naueus the Ephraimite to leade them, a man valiant in armes, and prouident in counsaile, and exceeding in pietie, and not degenerating in that respect from Moses his master. He also in such sort disposed certaine bands that he might not in any sort be cut off from water; he left also so many as might guard the multitude, & keepe the campe and weaker company. Thus stood they all the night long in a readines to take armes; such as they had fitted for them; expecting their captaines, who should lead them out to fight as soone as Moses should commaund them. On the other side Moses slept not, but instructed Iosue how he should conduct the army. And as soone as the day appeared, he encouraged Iosue to shew himselfe such a one in that battell, as both the place where with he was honoured, and the cause for which they fought, required; wiling him by his prowesse and good deserts to giue life and courage to his soldiers that followed him. Hee likewise exhorted the chiefe of the Hebrewes in particular, and in generall heartned and emboldened all other that entred the battell.

And

A And as touching himselfe (after he had thus disposed the armie, by words and effect) he retired himselfe vnto a mountaine, committing the army to Gods protection, and Iosue's conduct. Then encountered the armies on both sides; and euery one fought most valiantly, neither wanted there encouragements on either sides. And as long as Moses lifted up his hands, the Hebrewes had the better against the Amalechites. But for that he was vnable continually to support the same, (and because hee thoroughly perceived and obserued, that as often as hee helde downe his hands, so long the enemies droue the Israelites to retreat) hee willed his brother Aaron and Fron (his sister Maries husband) to stand on each side of him, and sustaine his hands and succour him, for feare his forces should faile him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrewes by maine force overcame the Amalechites, so that all of them had bene slaine. B if so bee the chace had continued, and had not been cut off by the approche of the night. At this time our predecessours obtained a most happie and necessarie victorie. For they had the vpper hand ouer them that were embattelled against them; and astonished and amazed the nations round about, and got great strength and riches by their trauell: for being seased of the enemies campe, they generally gate great riches, and particularly were all of them relieved; whereas before that time they had not necessarie meanes to maintaine themselves. And this victorie of theirs was the cause of their very great good fortune, not onely for the present, but also for the time to come. For not onely had they their enemies bodies vnder their subiection, but also their spirits; so as they were feared by all the nations round about. And they multiplied both in strength and riches: for there was a great quantitie of gold and siluer taken in the campe. Diuers vessels likewise and tables of brasse were found therein: likewise great quantity of tisse worke and excellent furniture for armes. Moreouer, they had all their baggage, tents, harness, and horses, and generally the whole prouision of an arranged battell became their prey. Then after also they became more vertuous, and industrious then before; supposing that the end of all actions was obtained by industrie. Thus ended this battell. The next day Moses caused the enemies that were slaine to be rifled, and gathered the scattered armes of those that fled. He honoured them also that had brauely demeaned themselves in the battell, & praised the Capitaine Iosue in publike, whose honour was confirmed by the applause of the whole armie. There was not one Hebrew that perished that day: and so manie of the enemies were there put to the sword, as their number cannot be expressed. Hee offered likewise a sacrifice of thanksgiving vnto God, and erected an altar vnto him, and dedicated it to God the Victor. Hee prophesied moreover, that all the Amalechites should be utterly extinguished, so that none of them should be left aliue, in that they had assaulted the Hebrewes, and that in the desert, and at such time as they were in affliction. He feasted the Generall in like sort. This issue had this battell, which was the first that was lenied against them, or durst assault them; since their departure out of Egypt. But as soone as Moses had celebrated a feast in memorie of the victorie, to the end hee might giue the Hebrewes some repose after the battell abouenamed, he caused them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed souldiers. Thus passing onwards by little and little, they arriued the third month after their departure out of Egypt, neere to the mountain of Sinai, where (as before time it hath been declared) Moses sawe the vision in the bush, and other such like wonders.

What counsell Raguel gave to his sonne in lawe.

When Raguel Moses father in lawe vnderstood of this his good successe, he came with great ioy vnto Moses, vnder purpose to salute him, his daughter Zephora, and her children, who (greatly reioicing at his arriual) prepared a sacrifice, and feasted the people neere vnto the bush that could not be consumed by fire; and in the banquet time the people was distinguished, according to the order and place of euery family. But Aaron with the assistants tooke Raguel, and they sung praises vnto God, ascribing to him both the meanes and manner of their libertie. They also spake much in honour of their Generall, by whose vertue all things had had so fortunate an issue. Raguel on his side highly praised the people, and dignified Moses their Gouvernour, by whose prudence so many good and valiant men were guided. But on the next day, Raguel seeing Moses oppressed with the multitude of businesse (by reason that he decided all their debates that appealed vnto him, who were thus perswaded of him, that that time they were onely rightly censured, when Moses gaue the sentence; and they that were G condemned by him, endured the verdict patiently, knowing that their cause was by him decided rather by the rule of iustice, then the instinct of amercee hee for that time kept silence (in that he was loath to hinder them, who any wayes pretended to receiue anie fruit of the vertue of his sonne in lawe.) But when he found him at conuenient leisure, hee withdrew him apart, and told him betwixt them twaine, that which hee ought to doe; counselling him that hee should discharge himselfe of that paine, concerning affaires of so little consequence, and reserve onely to himselfe those affaires which were of the greatest importance, and concerned the publike estate of them all. For that there were diuerse persons amongst the Hebrewes to be found, who would be capable and sufficient to heare and determine the pleas; but touching the care of so manie thousand soules, no man could vnder take it, except he were another Moses. H Knowing therefore (saide he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou hast behaved thy selfe towards the people, being the Minister of God, as concerning their lastitie: suffer them to comprimit amongst themselves those actions and quarrels that fall amongst them; and reserve this interest to thy selfe, that thou maist wholly intend the seruice of God, whereby thou maist more easily exempt the people from their present necessities. If therefore thou giuest credit to my counsailes in humane affaires, thou shalt make diligent search and musters of thy whole armie, and thou shalt establish Chieftaines that shall gouerne ouer ten thousand, and thousand, and five hundred, and ouer fifties, and shalt ordaine Gouvernours ouer them, who diuiding them by thirties, twenties, and tennes, may conduct and gouerne them: and let some some be appointed amongst them, who may receiue their titles, according to the number and names of those hee commaundeth. Who being approued by the whole companie, to be of good fame and vpriht conscience, may censure and compound all their differences; and if any controuersie shall fall out amongst any of them in authoritie, they shall reserve the deciding of that difficultie to thine owne person. By this meanes neither shall any one of the Hebrewes be defrauded of his right, and thou thy selfe seruing God without molestation, maist procure God to be more fauourable vnto thine armie.

Moses alloweth his father in laws aduice

This counsell of Raguel highly contented Moses, so that he fulfilled all that whereunto hee had suggested him, not concealing the inuention of this policie, neither attributing it to himselfe, but declaring publicly vnto all man, that his father in law was the inuenter thereof. He hath likewise written in his Bookes, that Raguel was the author of this gouernement; accounting it no lesse honour to attribute praise to those that deserue it, then shame to vsurpe vpon another mans desert; so that hereby you may coniecture his vertue: of which hereafter in many places we haue more to say. Moses afterwards assembling all the people, tolde them that hee would ascend the mountaine of Sinai to talke with God, to the ende that he might afterwarde returne vnto them, and impart vnto them whatsoever profitable thing hee had receiued from him in their behalfe. He likewise commaunded them to pitch their tents about the mountaine, and to haue it in reuerence, by reason of the Proximitie of God.

CHAP. IIII.

Moses ascendeth the mountaine, and receiue the Tables of the ten Commandments at Gods hands, and gaue them to the people.

Moses ascendeth the mountaine of Sinai.

His said, hee ascended the mountaine Sinai (which is the highest beyond comparifon of all that country, and which, by reason of his strange height, and for his steepe and inaccessible ragged rockes, is not onely vnfrequented by men, but also may not be beheld, by reason it traueleth the eye.) Further, for that it is reported, that God conuerleth and dwelleth on the same, it is held sacred by the inhabitants, and dreadfull and vnaccessible to all that behold it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commaundement of the Prophet, removing their tents, pitched them at the foote of the hill, suspending their iudgements, and expecting the execution of the promises of those goods which Moses had foreprophefied vnto them, at such time as he returned fro God. And in the meane space, while they expected their guide, they kept holy day, and fasted, and purified themselves for the space of three dayes in all sorts of purification and abstinence from the companie of their wiues, following that which Moses had commaunded them. They besought God also that he would be fauourable and asist Moses, and by his meanes to blesse them with some fauor, that might make their life good & happie. They banquetted also in great pompe, and their wiues and childre were richly attired: Now after they had feasted

A feasted fortie dayes space, on the third day before Sunne rising, a cloud couered all the Hebrewes campe (a thing before time vnseene by them) and inuironed al the place where they pitched their pauillions. And although all the rest of the country had a cleare and vntroubled skie; yet thereabout violent winds were raised, and hideously rored, and a tempestuous raine succeeded them; and thunderclaps dreadfull to heare, and lightnings horrible to beholde, signified that God was there present, and that Moses (with good successe, as it shall please them: but as touching my selfe, it is not Let those that read this, iudge thereof, as it shall please them: but as touching my selfe, it is not any waies lawfull for me to depart in any sort from that which is written in holy scriptures. That which the Hebrewes both heard and saw, in that it was straunge and vnaccustomed vnto them, troubled them greatly. Furthermore, the report that was published as touching that mountaine, that God repaired and dwelt on the same, maruailously amated their spirits: they therefore said B that God repaired and dwelt on the same, maruailously amated their spirits: they therefore said that God repaired and dwelt on the same, maruailously amated their spirits: they therefore said row the wrath of God, and expecting no lesse miserie themselves. But whilest they were thus troubled in thought, Moses presented himselfe vnto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleasing maiestic, and looks so contented, as they testified the inward consolation of his mind) whom they no sooner beheld, but suddenly all their feare vanished, and in place thereof a hope of some great good happe succeeded, and withall the ayre vpon his arriuall recovered his former cleerenesse and serenitie. Hereupon he summoned the people to a solempne and general assembly; to the end he might report, and they heare, what commaundements God had giuen them by him: no sooner were they assembled, but he (from an vpper place, to the end that all the people might both see and heare him) stood vp and spake after this manner. Know (saith he) you Hebrewes, that Almighty God, as hee hath neuer neglected my prayers hitherto; so at this time also hath he entertained me (being your truchman & messenger) verie graciously; & behold himselfe here in presence in your companie, and propitious to your supplications, readie to provide you of meat to sustaine your bodies, and order and dispose your policie to make it lasting & happy: now although that you see me, and that a humane tongue speaketh vnto you, yet despise not my words, no more then you doe his workes already executed and testified vpon our nation. For if you consider the worth and wonder thereof, you shall conceiue his greatnesse that hath brought them to passe, and hath neuer denied to talke with me, and heare mee when I spake C D for your profit. For it is not Moses the sonne of Amram, and of Iocabel, but hee it is that constrained Nilus to flow with blood, and that thorow diuerse plagues hath ramed the pride of the Egyptians: it is he that hath given you passage thorow the midst of the sea: it is hee that hath furnished you with meat prepared from heauen, at such time as you were in extremitie: it is he that made water spring out of the the rocke to coole your thirsts, at such time as you were in necessitie: it is he by whom Adam had the possession and fruition, both of the fruit of the earth, and the fishes of the sea: By him Noe escaped from the Deluge: by him our auncient father Abraham of a wandering pilgrimage, became an inhabitant of the land of Chanaan: by him Isaac was borne at such time as his father and mother were olde: by him Jacob hath bene ennobled by the vertue of his twelue sonnes: by him Ioseph became Lord ouer all the forces of the Egyptians: He it is that graciously imparteth these words vnto you by me his messenger; let therefore these holisome lawes of his bee holy and inuolable amongst you, and more deere vnto you then either your wiues or children: for in obseruing the same, you shall lead a happie life, enjoy a fruitfull countrey, a calme sea, and a progenie made happie according to the lawes of nature: finally, you shall become swaies dreadfull vnto your enemies. For I haue talked face to face with God, and haue heard his immortal voice; so dearely beloued are you vnto him, and so carefull is he of the prosperitie of your nation. This said, he conducted the people (both men, women and children) to the end they might heare God talke vnto them, and teach them what to do (for feare the law should haue been in lesser regard, if it had bene presented to their vnderstandings by a humane tongue) they all of them therefore heard his voice descending from the mountaine, so that euery one vnderstood the same. But these precepts which Moses left re- F gifted in two Tables, it is not lawfull for me to expresse in so many words, and therefore I will only expresse the sentences. For he teacheth vs:

First of all that there is one God, who is onely to be worshipped.
Secondly, that no image of any creature is to be adored.
Thirdly, that no man ought to sweare rashly.
Fourthly, that the seauenth day is not to be prophaned by any worke.
Fifthly, that father and mother should be honoured.

Sixthly, that we should abstaine from murther.
 Seuenthly, that adulterie is not to be committed.
 Eightly, that no man ought to steale.
 Ninthly, that false witnesse must not be borne.
 Tenthly, that no man ought to couet his neighbours goods.

When the multitude with great ioy had heard God himselfe speake vnto them (according as Moses had foretold them) he dismissed them, and each one departed to his tent. But some few daies after they presented themselves before his pavilion, beseeching him that hee should bring them thole lawes, which he had receiued at Gods hands: He to the intent to gratifie them, opened the lawes, and prescribed vnto each of them what they ought to doe at the same time (as in due place it shall be expressed.) But the greater part of the lawes I deferre till an other time, meaning in priuate to comment thereupon. About the verie same time, Moses once more ascended the mountaine of Sinai (hauing premonished the people thereof) and ascended the same in their sights: but when the time seemed tedious vnto them (for he was sequestred from them for the space of fortie daies) they were in great feare, least some inconuenience had hapned vnto him; neither were they so much agreed at that which had chanced vnto them, as for that they were perswaded of the death of Moses. For there fell a contention amongst them, the one affirming that he was dead and deuoured by wild beasts (which was their opinion, who conceiued a hatred against him) the other said that hee was rauished vp vnto God: but they of the wiser sort among them, who tooke no pleasure to heare any one of these their suspitions, contained themselves, being equally affected in respect of both the opinions; for that the one seemed not to bee estranged I from humane chance, and the other had some correspondence with the vertues of the man: so that they endured his fortune with an equall mind, and lamented their owne mishap, in that they were deprived of such a gouernour and patron as hee was, and whose like they thought it a matter impossible to find: neither did their care suffer them to hope: neither deprived of hope could they choose but complaine: neyther durst they remoue their tents, in that they were commanded to expect his returne. At length (when fortie dayes and fortie nights were past) hee returned vnto them; hauing (during that time) tasted no mortall sustenance: and by his arriual the whole host was replenished with great ioy; whom he certified that Gods providence was alwayes assisting them, and that during the terme of those dayes, he had learned the meanes how they should liue ciuilly, orderly, and blessedly: telling them that God commaunded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereinto hee would descend as often as it pleased him, which also in their trauell they might carry about with them; so that they should haue no more need to ascend vnto Sinai, but that he himselfe might come and lodge with them, and be assistant to their prayers. Hee told them likewise the measure and order of the said Tabernacle, and that they wanted nothing but that they presently addressed themselves to the building thereof. This said, hee shewed them the two Tables, containing the ten commandments written therein, in each of them siue: now were these written by the hand of God. They all of them (reioycing at that which they had heard and scene) ceased not to employ themselves to their vttermost: so that they brought in siluer, gold, brasse, and store of wood fit for building; and which would not be wormeaten, the haire of goates, and the skins of sheepe, the one dyed azure, and the other white; L woolls of the same colour, fine linnen, stones enchafed in gold, wherewith men were accustomed to decke themselves, with great quantitie of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, which was made like to a portable & mouing Temple: this stuffe being thus gathered together, & collected with so great affection (according to each mans vtmost abilitie, he appointed work-masters according to the commaundment of God, but such as the like might not haue beene chosen, although the matter had beene committed to the peoples suffrages: their names are now likewise extant in the volumes of the sacred scriptures. Beseleel of the tribe of Iuda, the sonne of Vron of the tribe of Iuda, & Mary Moses sister: and Eliab the sonne of Isamach, of the tribe of Dan: The people shewed themselves so forward in the finishing of this worke, that Moses was compelled to restrain them, causing it to be proclaimed, that they had sufficiently gathered for the worke already: for the workmasters certified him no lesse. They therefore addressed themselves, to finish how many vessels they ought to haue, according to the module which god had proposed to Moses. The women also strove with emulation to exceed each other in the making of the vestures of the priests, and other things which were couenient for that worke, to the end to honour the service of God.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tabernacle made by Moses in the desert, resembling a portable Temple.

Now when all things were prepared for this worke, as gold, brasse, & wouen worke, Moses commanded them to feast, and sacrifice each one according to his abilitie, and set forward the building of the Tabernacle. First of all therefore he measured the outward court, which in bredth contained fiftie, and in length one hundred cubites, in such manner as followeth. He raised pales of siue cubites high, and twentie in length from the one side to the other, and ten in breadth, in the hindside to euery one of these pales or postes there were fastened rings, the chapters whereof were siluer, and the bases thereof of golde, and the lower parts of these resembled the points of a spere made of brasse, and fixed in the earth: Thorow the rings there passed certaine cords of siue cubites length, which on the one side fastned in the ground with brassen nayles of a cubits length, did fasten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle against the force of winds: Then was there a most fine silken Curtaine drawne about the same, which hanging from the chapters of the bases, and inclosing all that place, seemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three sides of the inclosure arownded. But the fourth side, being of fiftie cubites, was the front of the whole frame; the doore whereof was twentie cubits wide, hauing on both sides double barres in stead of posts; and these also were of siluer, except the bases which were of brasse; and on both sides there stood three barres well fastned, which were also hung round about with a Curtaine of wouen silke: but at the gate there hung a vaile of twentie cubits long, and siue deepe, wouen of purple, violet and fine silke, embroidered with diuers flowers, without any figures of sensible creatures: within the gates there was a brassen Ewer, with a foote of the same mettall, wherein the Priests might wash their hands and feet. And after this manner was the inclosure of the Court; In the midst hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the East, that the rising sunne might shine vpon it: the length thereof was thirty cubits, and the bredth twelue; the one of the walles thereof was towards the South, an other towards the North, but the hinder part was toward the West; and it was as high as long; and on each side there were twentie wooden planks foure square, and ioyned together, foure fingers thicke, and a cubit and a halfe broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and euerie boord had two hinges, which were put thorow the two bases that were of siluer, & in their sockets receiued the hinges of the boords: the planks of the west wall were siue in number, and gilded both within and without, all of them so closed together as it seemed to be but one wall. But on both sides there were certaine boords neerly ioyned together, which in bredth contained the measure of one cubit and a halfe; and in thickeesse, the third part of a hand bredth; and so made vp thirtie cubits: but siue boords made vp the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were ioyned other two boords cut halfe a cubit broad, which they placed in the corner in stead of whole ones: euerie boord had rings of gold fastned to the outward front thereof, riueted in order, and answering one another on euerie side. Thorow these rings were put certaine barres which were couered with gold, euerie one siue cubits long, which ioyned the boords together: and the ende of euery barre was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a boxe. And on the backside of the walles of the Tabernacle, there was one ranke of barres placed long-wise, passing thorow all the planks, in which by hookes or haspes, the sides of either were held together, and riueted and fastned one within the other; by which meanes the Tabernacle was secured from the force of winds, and kept steddie, and immouable. Within, the length thereof was diuided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubites, on the inside were placed foure pillars made of the same worke and matter, planted on like bases, and distant one from the other by equall spaces ouerthwart, beyond these was the secret place. The rest of the Tabernacle was for all the Priests; and this tripartite diuision of the Tabernacle resembled the nature of the world, for the third part (which was contained within the four pillars, to which the priests had no access) did in a manner represent heauen the seat of God: but the space of twentie cubits (which was onely permitted to the Priest, and was vnaccessible to others) resembled the sea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed siue pillars vpon brassen bases; after these the Curtaines were spread about the Tabernacle, wouen of silke, and embroidered with purple, violet, and scarlet colours; the first of these was spread tenn cubits euery way, & was drawn about the pillars, which separated the Adyt from the other space, and seuered it from the sight of men; and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that was situate beyond the foure pillars, it was called the Sanctum sanctorum, or holie of holiest: and this curtaine or vaile was pictured with all sorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diuersified with all that which might giue it ornament; but that there were no figures of liuing creatures to be found therein. The second vaile equalled the first in greatnesse, workmanship, and colour; and encompassed the foue pillars of the entrie, which reaching from the top to the midst of them, and fastened to each of them by a certaine ring, gaue access to the Priests that entred the same: To this almost was there annexed on the outside another vaile of like bignesse and wouen of linnen, drawne vpon cordes from the one side to the other, by means of certaine rings; which was sometimes spread, and other times (especially on the holy daies) vnspread, least it should hinder the peoples sight: on the other daies (especially such as were cloudie) it was spread and serued for a couerture to defend the painted vaile from the weather. Sithence, that custome hath continued after the building of the Temple, that another such like vaile (as this) should bee spread in the entrance. Besides this, there were ten other vailes, foure cubits broad, and twentie eight cubits long, with certaine golden hookes, enchaisted the one within the other, to the ende to conioyne them, so that they seemed to bee one; which being spread did couer the Tabernacle in the vpper part, and the walles on the sides and behind; not extending to the earth within the compasse of a foote. Moreover, there were eleuen other hangings of equall breadth, but longer; namely, euery one of the of thirtie cubits, wouen with as great art of haire, as the other out of wooll: which couering all the rest extending to the earth, resembled the forme of a bed-chamber, one of them couered and extended from the front, which being the eleuenth, was annexed to this vse: these also were couered with certaine skinnes sewed together, which protected the same against the storme and iniurie of raine: for which cause, to them that beheld it from farre, it seemed a thing most worthe of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other sort shine, then as if a man should haue beheld the heauens. But the vailes of haire and skinnes hung after such a maner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, set to resist the force and outrage of stormes and tempests.

After that the Tabernacle was after this manner buiided, they erected also an Arke, which was dedicated vnto God, of a certaine wood that was naturally strong, and such as was permanent and resisted corruption. This in our native tongue is called seoron, framed after this manner. The length thereof was of foue handfuls, and the breadth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was couered with golden plates, and it had a couer fitted with golden hinges, egall on euerie side. And to euerie side in length there were fastened two rings of gold, driuen and riueted through the whole wood, and through them certaine barres of gold were thrust, that whensoever there were any neede, it might be carried any wayes: for neuer was it borne on beasts backs, but the Priests bare it on their shoulders. On the couer thereof there were two semblances planted, which the Hebrewes call Cherubins (which are winged creatures, of a strange forme, the like whereof were neuer seene by any man) which Moses saw figured on Gods seate. In this Arke he placed the Tables containing the ten commaundements: in euery one five, and in euerie page two and a halfe: and this Arke hid hee within the Sanctuary.

The Table.

IN the Tabernacle he placed a Table not vnlike to that at Delphos, two cubits in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feet thereof, from the midst downwards, were like those feet which the Dorians set vnto their beds; but that which ascended from the other halfe vpwads, was square: The bodie of this Table was surrounded with a border standing out foure fingers length, and in euerie of the feet there were rings fastened about the top of the foote, to which were annexed on both sides two things after the manner of handles, gilded, and framed of most firme wood, which were not thrust through the circle on both sides like barres, but with a button tooke hold of the vpper border of the Table, and both comprehended the ring of the foot, being a means to transfer it whithersoever need requir-

A required: This was wont to bee placed in the Temple towards the North wall, not farre from the Sanctuarie: and on it were placed twelue vnleavened loaves, set sixe by sixe the one ouer against the other, and made of two Assars of the purest wheate, which measure of the Hebrewes contained seuen Corylas of the Athenians; and about these loaves two golden pots filled with frankincense; but after seuen dayes other loaves were set in their place on that festiual day, which we call the Sabbath. The cause of which ceremonie shall hereafter be declared by vs. Hard by this Table neere the South wall, was placed a Candlestick of molten gold (but not solide) of one hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrewes call Cinchar, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with bowles, lillies, pomgranats, and little cuppes; then arising vpwads from one base, it was diuided into seuen branches, according to the number of the Sunne and the rest of the Planets: it stretched out likewise into seuen heads, hauing orderly correspondencie the one with the other, on which were planted seuen candles, according to the number of the seuen Planets, which branched out towards the East and South, in that the Candlestick was set sidelong. Betweene this and the Table (as I said) was a little Altar crected for incense, made of lasting wood likewise; and couered on euerie side with a solide plate, being a cubite broad from euerie corner, and twise as high, on which there stood a little hearth enuironed with a golden crowne on euerie side, in which were rings with their barres and stauies, whereby it might be borne by the Priests in the way. There was another Altar of wood also before the doore of the Tabernacle, couered with plates of brass, foue cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with brass, the hearth whereof was made after the manner of a grate: for the earth receiued whatsoeuer fire fell from above by reason there was no base therevnder, but neere vnto the Altar there were tunneles and pots, and censers, & cups, with other instruments made for the diuine seruice, all which were of pure gold.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the vestment of the Priest, and of the high Priest.

Such was the Tabernacle with all that belonged thereunto. Now remaineth it for mee to discourse of the vestments of the other Priests, which they call Chaneas, as of the high Priest, whom they name Sar-Hazabachin, signifying thereby the high Priest. And first of all as touching the ordinarie Priests. When as the Sacrificer (purified according to the purification which is ordained by the Law) addresseth himselfe to sacrifice; he first of all inuesteth himself with Manachasses (which is as much to say, a trusse or restrainer, which is a kind of breech, or flop, couering the priuities, made of wouen silke) wherethrough hee thrusts his feete, as in a paire of vpper breeches, and fastens the same about his loynes: On this hee casts a linnen shirt or surplice, made of double linnen (which wee call Chetomene) and that word signifieth a linnen garment or surplice: for we call linnen Cheton (that kinde of garment is a coate coming downe to the ankles, bound to the bodie; hauing narrow sleeves about the armes) which is tied vpon the breast a little beneath the armeholes, with a girdle foure fingers broad, inwardly void, so wrought as it seemed to be like a serpents skinne.) It is likewise pictured with red, purple, Hyacinthine & silken flowers, but the ground is only silk; which being twise doubled about his breast, extendeth downe to his ankles at such time as hee desisteth from sacrifice, (and this seemed they to weare in way of ornament) but when as hee is to minister in sacrifice, then (least blowne vpon by the wind, it should hinder his worke) he casts it on his left shoulder. This girdle Moses calleth Abaneth, and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians, name it Emian (for so call they it.) This coat was in no maner pleited, and in the necke hath a broad opening, fastened about the two shoulders with clasps, from the edge of the collar to the breast and the midst of the backe: This call they Masbassanes. But on his head hee weareth a har (not made with a high crowne, neither comprehending the whole head, but somewhat more then the halfe:) this is called Masnaemphthes; which is decked and dight after such a rate, that it seemeth a Chapplet made of thicke Riban, or of wouen linnen often times doubled and sowed, which in the vpper part is couered with another linnen, descending to the front, hiding those leames of the Riban which were vnwisely to be beheld; this is curiously fitted, least during the time of sacrifice it should slip off. Such in generall were the ornaments of the Priests. The high priest also vseth the verie same (omitting none of those things which wee haue reckoned vpon) but beside the rest he put on a Hyacinthine coloured coat, extending in length to his hammes (which our countrey call Methir) this girdeth he vnto him with a girdle of diuers colours,

colours (not vnlike the former) but that it is studded with gold: but the skirt of the vesture is bordered with fringes, sowed together, to which are tied certaine counterfait pomgranates with certaine golden bells, properly disposed; to that betweene two Pomgranates, there is placed a bell, and betweene two bells one Pomgranate. This coat is not made of two pieces (as hauing seames on the shoulders, and on the sides) but a long vaile wouen and left open in the collar, not a thwart but long-waies, from the breast to the midft of the backe. To it is a riban or hemme fastned, least the opening should be perceiued: it is likewise open in that place where the hands should be put out. Besides these vestures, he hath a third called an Ephod (resembling a Grecian frocke, that is made after this manner.) It is wouen of diuers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midft of the breast there is a space left open: the sleeves are made in such maner, and all the rest in such sort compoled, that it seemeth to be a coat: in this void space there is a piece enchaufed of the bignes of a span long, embrodered with the same colours, gold, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Esfen, that is as much to say, as Rationall (which wholly filleth the space that was left void by them that haue wouen the Ephod.) And this piece is ioyned with the Ephod, and to euerie corner thereof with buckles of gold, which are tied with a lace of Hyacinth applied to tie them together with these buckles. And to the end the space between the buckles be not slacke, they filled the suture with a Hyacinthine thread: but on cyther shoulder two Sardonix stones enchaufed in gold (in stead of buttons) doetic the hood or Ephod; in these are ingrauen the names of Iacobs sonnes in Hebrew Characters, in cyther stone sixe: so that the elder of them were placed on the right shoulder. Moreouer twelue precious stones distinguish the Esfen or Rationall it selfe, of excellent greatnes and beautie, which for their inestimable price could not be bought by any priuate man. They were enchaufed three and three in foure ranks in certaine crownes of gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the first order was a Sardonix, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the second, a Carbuncle, a Iaspis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurys, an Amethyst, and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chrysolite, an Onyx, and a Berill stone. In these were the names of Iacobs sonnes engrauen, whom we esteeme for the first authors of our tribes (euery stone being honoured with a seuerall name, according to the order of their birth.) But whereas these rings (whereof before we haue spoken) are weake and cannot sustaine the weight of the precious stones, they made other two greater in the top of the Rationall inclining toward the necke-ward, being eminent aboue the texture, which might receiue the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the shoulders to be fastned with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked, and conueied certaine pipes, put thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brim behind the Ephod, to fasten the Rationall, to the end it should neyther sway this waies nor that waies. To the same Rationall also was there a girdle sewed, distinguished with the said colours & gold, which comprehending the whole, and againe knit vpon the seame was suffered to hang downewards. And as touching the fringes, they were shut in hollow loops of gold from the one end vnto the other. Now his hat was such as the other priests vsed, on which there stood an other sewed thereto, and flourished with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was inuironed with a golden crowne, in which there were diuers vessels of gold made after such a sort as may be seene in that herbe which we call Daccharus, and amongst the Grecian herbalists, Henbane. And least any man that hath heretofore seene the same, should be ignorant of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the same, hath not seene the herbe it selfe; I haue thought good to set downe the description thereof in this place. This herbe is of the height of three spans, it hath a roote like a Turnep or Nauuev (and he shall not erre, that in regard thereof shall compare it therewith) it hath leaues that resemble Smalage or Rocquet: this out of the stem thereof yeeldeth forth a certaine bud cleauing to the branches of it, inuested with a coar, which it casteth off when the fruit waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the ioynt of a little finger, hauing a circumference like vnto a cup, which I will describe more fully, once againe that the ignorant may the better discover it. In the lower part thereof about the bottome it resembleth in roundnes a halfe bowle; and according as it groweth euery part thereof is streightned, vntill being againe dilated in the extremitie or brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much vnlike to a Pomgranate cut in the middest, to which there is annexed and groweth a round cover as if turned and framed on purpose, hauing those eminent clefs (as I said) like to the midft of a Pomgranate, resembling the pointed and sharp thornes, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certaine fruit vnder the couer, and in the whole cup is like to the seed of the herbe Sideritis, his flower is not much vnlike that which springeth from the poppey. Such was this crowne about the necke and the two temples, for these cups came not neere the front or brow. For on

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the strange & causelesse malice, which other nations haue conceiued against vs, as if we were iniurious against the diuine maiestie, which (they say) they so much honour. For, if a man marke the composition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Priest, and consider all the necessities which wee vse in celebrating the diuine seruice; they shall finde that our lawmaker was a man of a diuine spirit, and that we without any desert are iniured by other nations. For if without partialitie a man will duely examine it, hee shall finde that all things haue bene done to represent and figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, diuided into three parts, whereof two are left for the sacrificers as a place proportioned and common, signifying the land and sea wherein all sorts of creatures are conuerfant. But the third part is sequestred and reserved for God alone; in like sort as the heauen is vnaccessible by men. The table on which the twelue loaves were placed, signifieth the yearre diuided into 12. moneths. The candlestick made of seauenty peeces, signifieth the twelue signes, thorow which euery one of the seauen Planets passe: the seauen lampes that were therein, represented the seauen planets. The vailes made of foure seuerall kinds of stufes resembled the foure Elements. For the linnen seemed to represent the earth, from whence it was drawn and deriued. The purple resembled the sea, because the purple colour is made of the blood of a shell fish called Murex. The Hyacinth signifieth the ayre: and as touching the scarlet, it signifieth the fire. The tunicle likewise of the high Priest demonstrateth the earth, for it is made of linnen. The Hyacinth sheweth the Pole: the Pomgranates resembled the lightning; as the bells, the noyse of the thunder. The sircot sheweth that the whole world is compassed of foure Elements resembled in his foure colours, to which gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that light is annexed to all things. Esfen also is planted in the middle thereof in such sort as the earth obtaineth the middle place of the world: Likewise the girdle wherewith he is girt resembleth the sea, which enfoldeth & begirreth all things. The two Sardonix stones (set as buttons or loops in the high Priests garment) signifie the Sun & Moon: the number of the gems are alluded to the number of the moneths, or the twelue houes, or the equal number of the parts of that circle, which the Græcians call the Zodiack (he shall not much erre that followeth cyther the one, or the other of these opinions.) The cap likewise hath an allusion to heauen, by reason of his azure or Hyacinthine colour, for otherwise the name of God might not be placed therein. For it was beautified with a crowne of gold, to signifie the light wherein God highly delighteth. Let this suffice for the present, for that which we shall discourse hereafter, will furnish vs with sufficient and ample matter to shew and set out the vertue of our lawmaker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Priesthood, & the lawes which appertain to the feasts and sacrifices.

After these things aboue said were finished and left as yet vnconsecrated, God appeared vnto Moses, commaunding him to establish Aaron his brother in the Priesthood (who in respect of his vertue, deserued that title of honour aboue all the rest.) For which cause Moses (assembling the congregation) discoursed vnto them his vertues; and discovered his good affection, and reckoned vnto them how many dangers he had suffered in their behalfe, (whereof each of them gaue ample testimonie, declaring the forward zeale and loue they alwaies bare vnto him) whereupon he spake vnto them after this manner. The worke is now brought to such an end as it hath pleased God; and hath been possible for vs: and for that you know we are to receiue him into this Tabernacle, we ought aboue all things to haue an especiall care in the election of such a one, who shall make sacrifice and supplication for vs. Touching my selfe, if the matter depended on my priuate choise, I should esteeme no man more worthy then myselfe to execute this function, both for that naturally men loue themselves, and for that I am well assured, how many trauels I haue supported for your safety sake! But God himselfe hath iudged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath chosen him for his high Priest and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of vs in equitie and iustice: commaunding that he should be inuested with the robe consecrated to God; and that hee should take charge of the altars and sacrifices. Hee shall make prayers for you vnto God, who will heare them willingly, by reason that he hath care of your rite; and will receiue them proceeding from a personage whom hee himselfe had elec-tested. These words of his were gratefull vnto the people, and they all of them approued the G election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour then any other, both by reason of his race, as also in regarde of the prophcing spirit and vertue of his brother : he had at that time foure sonnes, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoever remayned of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was employed to make vailles to couer the Tabernacle, Candlestick, Altar, and the other instruments, to the end that in their traualle they should not be soiled, either by raine or dust. And hauing once more assembled the people together, hee commaunded them to offer euery one of them halfe a sicle; (now the sicle is a kinde of Hebrew coyne, that is as much in value as foure Athenian drammes) whereunto they obeyed willingly, so that the number of them that offered was sixe times one hundreth thousand, fise hundreth and fiftie : and they that brought this money were such H as were of a free condition, and betwixt the yeares of twentic and fiftie; and that which was receiued, was employed in the necessities of the Temple. Then did hee purifie the Tabernacle, and the Priests, in manner and forme following. He tooke the waight of fise hundreth sicles of cholen Myrrhe, and the like quantity of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a most odoriferous drugge) the halfe of the sayde waight; and hee caused all these to be beaten and infused in a Hin of oyle of oliue, others write palme (this Hin is one of our measures contayning two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed & boiled together, according to the art of perfumers, and he made thereof a most odoriferous oyntment : which hee tooke and annoynted the Priest withall, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them; offering many and sundry sorts of beastes of great price to sacrifice within the temple vpon the Altar of I gold (whereof I forbear to speake any further, for feare I should grow offensive and tedious to the readers.) Twice a day before the sunne rise, and sunne set, they were to burne incense, and purifie the oyle and refresh the lampes, whereof three ought to burne euery day vpon the sacred Candlestick in honour of God, and the rest werelighted in the euening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Be-seleel and Eliab were the most excellent and expertest workmen: for whatsoever had bene enterprised by others, they in their art polished and perfected; and they of themselves found many new things of their owne inuention: yet was Beseleel iudged the most excellent of them two.

All the time employed in this worke, was seven months, and at that time was the yeare accomplished, which began at their departure out of Aegypt. In the beginning of the second yeare, K in the month which the Macedonians call Xantichus, and the Hebrewes Nisan, vpon the newe moone they dedicated the Tabernacle with all things belonging thereunto, according as I haue made mention. And God presently testified that both their gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrewes labors fruitfull and pleasant in his sight, testifying his presence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the heauen was otherwaies cleere and faire, ouer the Tabernacle only there was a cloud, not wholly thicke like a winter storme, nor obscure; and yet not so thicke as a man could see thorow the same, from whence there descended a dewe that gaue testimonie of Gods presence vnto them that had will, and beliefe. Moses honoured the workmasters that made the worke, with such rewardes as appertained vnto them by desert; and sacrificed according as God had commanded him in the doore or porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, a Ramme, and a Kid L for their sinnes (but with what ceremonie these things are done, I will declare when I intreat of sacrifices, as also what offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the lawe are allowed to be fed vpon) and with the blood of the slaughtered beastes he besprinkled the vestment of Aaron, and purified both him and his children with fountaine water and the precious oyntment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seven daies space he consecrated both themselves, and their vestments and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained therunto; with that oyle whereof I haue before time foretold you, with the blood of Bulls, and Rammes slaine euery other day after their kind. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a holy day and festiual to all the people, and decreed that euery one of them should particularly sacrifice according to his abilitie, and they with emulation (striving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered vp M their sacrifices according as it was commaunded them.

Whilest thus the sacrifices were vpon the Altar, sodainly there issued a fire from them, which kindled of it selfe, the flame whereof resembled the light or brightness of lightning; and consumed all that which was vpon the Altar. At that time there hapned an inconuenience to Aaron, which although it somewhat moued and amated his fatherly patience, yet digested hee it with a constant and generous mind: for he was a man of much constancy, and such a one as knew that nothing

A nothing could befall him without the presence and providence of God. For of those foure sons (which I told you that he had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing sacrifices vnto the Altar (not such as were appointed by Moses, but of that sort they were accustomed to offer beforetimes) were burned by the violent flame that issued from the Altar, seising both their breasts and faces, in such a sort, as by no meanes possible that might be extinguished; so that at length they died. Moses commaunded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the host, and burie them sumptuously: all the people wept and were amaised verie much at this their death, so strange and vn suspected. But Moses ordained that neither the father, nor his sonnes should lament; but that they should rather make estimate of Gods honour, then of their owne misfortune: for Aaron was already inuested in the sacred robe.
B But as touching Moses, he refused all honours which were offered him by the people, neither applied he himselfe vnto any other thing but to the seruice of God: neyther did hee ascend any more vp to the mountaine of Sinai, but entered into the Tabernacle to take counsaile at Gods hands in those things, whereof he had neede to be informed. He demeaned himselfe like a pri-uate man, not only in his apparrell, but in all other things, and liued verie popularly, persering in that familiar and ciuill course of life, and challenging no priuiledge about any man, but only in those things which pertained to the administration of the common weale.

Besides these, he reduced vnder writing both the lawes and ordinances as touching Policie, in due performance whereof if they should liue, they should bee both agreeable to God, and liue without cause of controuersie the one against the other. And all this established he, following those directions which God had instructed him in. But now will I returne and bend my stile to discourse vpon that which I haue omitted in the ornament of the high Priest: for this appar-rell of theirs leaueth not any occasion to false prophets, to execute their wicked impostures; and if there bee any such, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods maiestie, this habite maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to be present with the sacrificers, at such time as it pleaseth him; and to bee absent when him listeth: which God would haue made knowne not only to the Hebrewes, but to all those strangers, who by any occurrence might bee eyewitnesses of the same. For of those stones which the high Priest bare on his shoulders (which were Sardonixes, whose nature is so notorious to all men, that it were vnnecessary to reueale it) the one shined at such time as there was any offering, & that other which was fastened on his right shoulder, shined verie cleerely at such time as God was present at the sacrifice, and cast his rayes as farre off, that it might be perceived by those that beheld the same, both contrarie to his nature and custome: which truly deserueth admiration amongst all men, except those who thorow contempt of religion, doe hunt after an opinion of wisdom. But that which I will now speake of is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelue stones which the high priest bare (sewed and inhaled in his Rationall in the midst of his breast) God was wont to foreshew victorie to those that were addressed to battell. For such brightnesse lightened out of them, even before such time as the army did dislodge or enter skirmish, that it was notoriously knowne to the people, that God was present and readie to assise them: for which cause the Greeks making account of our manner of liuing, in that they had no power or reason to contradict it, haue called that Rationall which we rearme Essen (moued thereunto by this express miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rationall and the stone Sardonix gaue ouer to nine two hundreth yeares before I began to write these Antiquities, by reason of Gods wrath which hee had conceived through the breach of his lawes (of which at another time I will more fully intreat, and at this time continue and prosecute my intended discourse and purpose.) After the Tabernacle had bene thus consecrated, and that which appertained to the priests was set in order, the people was perswaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and beganne to sacrifice and sing hymnes of praises, as to him that had driuen farre from them all suspicion of euill, and from whom they expected in time to come farre better and more prosperous things; and both in generall and in particular they offered gifts vnto God according to their tribes: for the gouernours of the tribes (assembling themselves together two by two) prepared a chariot and a yoke of oxen, so that there were fixe chariots to beare the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore euery one of them offered a viall and a censur, and a cofer to keepe incense in, which was esteemed to be worth ten Dariques, and this was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the censur was of siluer, and both of them together weighed two hundreth sicles; yet on the viall there were but 70. employed: and both the cofer and vial were filled with meale steeped and moulded in oyle, which they were wont to use at the Altar, at such times as they offered sacrifice. They offered likewise a Calfe, and a Ram, with a Lambe of one year old, for a burnt sacrifice; and a Goat for a sinne offering. All the other gouernours likewise brought euery one of them their sacrifice called Salutarie, for euery day two Oxen and five Rams, with a Lambe and a Goat of a yeare old, and sacrificed them during the terme of twelue daies euery day one. But Moses ascended no more the mountaine of Sainai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was instructed by God of that which hee had to doe, and what lawes he ought to make, which are so good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wisdom: They haue bene faithfully obserued likewise alwaies, because they are supposed to be receiued from God. So that not any one of his lawes haue bene transgressed by the Hebrewes, neither in peace (at such time as they liued to their content) neither in war, at such time as they were afflicted therewith. But I will now cease to speake of these lawes, being resolved to compose an other treatise as touching the same.

Now will I only reckon vp a few things as touching the purifications & sacrifices (in that we haue begun to talke of sacrifices.) The sacrifices are of two sortes: the one of them is made for a priuate person; the other for the people in generall: and these are made in two manners; for in the one, all is consumed which is vpon the Altar, which for that cause are called Holocausts, that is to say, Burned. The other are of thanksgiuing, and they are made with banquets of those that sacrifice. But first of all I will speake of the first kind. The particular person that offered a burnt offering, killed an Oxe, a Lambe, and a Goate of one year olde, (yet is it lawfull to kill oxen more elder.) But all those creatures which must be consumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the priests besprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dresse they the beast, and cut it in pieces, and powder it with salt, and lay it on the Altar already charged with clef woud, and flaming fire: then after they haue well cleansed the feete and intrails, they lay them with the rest; and the priests take the skins. Such is the manner of a burnt offering or Holocaust. They that offer sacrifices of thanksgiuing, kill likewise such sorts of beasts without spot, and more then a yeare old; both male and female: and after they haue cut their throats, they sprinkle the blood on the Altar: then take they the reynes, the caul, and all the fat; with the lobe of the liuer, and the tayle of the mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the breast, and the left leg is left to the priests: and as touching the rest of the flesh, the priests banquet therewith for the space of two daies; and if then there remaine any thing thereof it is burned. The same custome and ceremonie likewise is obserued in the sacrifice for sinne: but those that are not of ability to offer the greater offerings, offer vp two Pigeons, or two Turtles; the one of which the priests haue to feast withall, & the other is consumed with fire. We will intreat more expressely of the sacrifices of such beasts, at such time as we shall discourse vpon sacrifices. For he that hath sinned vpon ignorance offereth a Lambe, and a shee Goat at the same time. The priest besprinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in such manner as it is said heretofore, but the hornes of the Altar only: and on the Altar they offer the kidneies, and the rest of the fat, with the lobe of the liuer: the priests cary away the skins, and eate the flesh within the Temple the very same day; because the law permitteth them not to referue any thing till the next morrow: he that hath sinned (and that knoweth it in himselfe without the knowledge or priuity of any other man) offereth a Lambe according as the law commandeth, the flesh whereof is in like sort deuoured by the priests the same day: but if the gouernours offer for their sinnes, they sacrifice in like manner as priuate men doe, and are different from them in that they bring a Bull, or a male Kid. The law also ordaineth, that in sacrifices both priuate and common, there should be fine flower brought, for a Lambe, the measure of an Affar; for a Ramm, the measure of two; with a Bull, three; which flower is first of all mingled and wrought with oyle, and set vpon the Altar to be sanctified. They that sacrifice likewise doe bring oyle, the halfe part of a Hin for a Bull; for a Ramm, the third of the same measure; and for a Lambe, the fourth part: this Hin is an Hebrew measure, which containeth two Attique Choas: they brought also the like measure of wine as of oyle, and poured out the wine neere to the Altar. And if any without sacrificing offer vp fine flower, he putteth the first fruits vpon the Altar, that is to lay one handfull, and the rest is taken by the priests for their maintenance, eyther fried (for

A (for they are kneaded in oyle) or with loaves made thereof: but whatsoever the Priest offereth, all that must be burned. The lawe likewise forbiddeth to offer any beast whatsoever, that day that it is borne, or to kill it with his damme, or in any other sort before it hath fedde twelue dayes. There are also other sacrifices made for deliuerance from sicknesse, or for other causes; in which sacrifices they employ wine or licour with that which is offered, of which licours it is not lawfull to referue any thing against the next morrow, when the Priests haue taken that portion which belongeth to them, and sufficeth them. The law commandeth that on the common purse there be euery day killed a Lambe of a yeere olde, the one in the morning, the other at the shutting vp of the euening: and on the seauenth day, which is called the Sabaoth, that two should be offered in that manner as hath bene declared. And on the newe moone besides their daily offerings they sacrifice two Oxen, seauen yearling Lambes, and a Wether and a Kid, for the abolition of those sinnes which are committed thorow forgetfulnessse. On the seauenth moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) besides the aboue-named, they sacrifice a Bull, one Mutton, seuen Lambes, and a Kid for sinnes. The tenth day of the same month according to the Moone, they fast till the euening, and on the same day they sacrifice a Bull, two Muttons, seuen Lambes, and a Goat for a sinne offering: besides which they bring two Kids, one of which is sent aliue out of the limits of the campe into the desert (on whome all the euill may fall, if so be any bet threatened to the people) the other is borne without the camp into a cleane place, where it is burned with the skinn, being not any waies purged: with this they burne a Bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but by the proper costs of the priest. This Bull being opened and slain, & the blood therof (with that of the goat) being caried into the Tabernacle, he sprinketh the couer thereof with his finger seuen times, & the paucinent as many times, and the Tabernacle & the Altar of gold, and all the rest about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. Besides that, they set on the Altar the reynes, and the fat with the lobe of the liuer, and the Priest offereth vnto God a Mutton for a burnt offering. The fifteenth day of the sayd month (at such time as it draweth towards winter) he commanded them to plant Tabernacles euery one in his family, against the instant cold weather which the increasing year was wont to bring, & that while they should enjoy their countrey, and should enter that Citie which they should holde for their Metropolitane (by reason of the Temple which should be there builded) they might celebrate a feast during eight dayes space, in offering burnt offerings and sacrifices vnto God: and that in witness of their thanksgiuing, they should beare in their hands a branch of Mirtle, and of Willow tied together with wooll, and a bough of Palme likewise, to which a Peach was fastned; and that the first day they should sacrifice thirteen Oxen, and fourteene Lambes, and two Sheepe, with a Goat for a sinne offering. Those daies that insued they sacrificed likewise a like number of Lambes, and Wethers with a Kid, and in rebating day by day the number of Oxen, they come backe to the seuenth. The eighth day they cease from worke, on this day (as we haue sayd) they sacrifice a Calfe, a Ram, and seuen Lambes, and a Kid for a sinne offering: and it is the custome of the Hebrewes to performe these sacrifices at such time as they pitch their Tabernacles. In the month Xantique (which we call Nisan) which is the first month of the yeare, the fourteenth day after the new Moone, the Sunne being in Aries (for at that time were we deliuered out of Egypt) he ordained that euery yeare we should doe sacrifice, which we call the passeouer, which (as I said) was celebrated the same time that we departed out of Aegypt. This solemnity of Easter we celebrate by companies, without referuing any thing of that which is offered till the next day. The fifteenth day the feast of vnleavened bread followeth the solenity of the Passeouer, & during those seuen daies, it is vnlawfull to eate any vnleavened bread, and euery day are slaine two Bulls, one Ram, and seauen Lambes, which are all consumed with fire, to which there is added a Kid for a sinne offering, for a seuerall daies banquet to feast the Priests with. The second day of this feast of vnleavened bread (which is the sixteenth of the month) they begin to enjoy the fruites that are mowed, and before that time vtouched: and for that it is verie conuenient that GOD should be honoured with the first fruites thereof, from whom they receiue such abundance, F they offer the first fruits of Barley after this manner. After they haue dried a handfull of the eares, they beate or thresh it, and cleanse the Barley from the chaffe, and offer an Affar of the same vpon the Altar vnto God, and after they haue cast a handfull of the same on the Altar, they leaue the rest for the Priests vse: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reape as wel in publike as in particular. With these first fruits they sacrifice vnto God a Lambe for a burnt offering. Seuen weeks after the feast of the Passeouer (that is fortie nine dayes) on the fiftieth (which the Hebrewes by reason of the number, call Asartha) they offer vnto God a leaueed bread made of wheat lands, they were restored vnto them in this manner following. The Iubile being at hand (which word signifieth libertie) both he that sold, and he that bought the land, meet together, and cast vp the account of the profits and expences that haue beene reaped and bestowed on the land; and if it be found that the profits do amount, he that sold the land repossesseth it: but if the charges exceed the value of the profits, he restoreth the surplusage to the buier that is due vnto him, and retaineth the land to himselfe. And if the profits and expences are answerable the one vnto the other, the restitution is made to him that had the auncient inheritance. Hee ratified likewise the same lawe in houses that were bought in Villages or Cities. For if he that sold, counted down the money hee had receiued before the yeare were finished; hee compelled the purchaser to restore him his house: and if hee stayed till the yeare were fully finished, the possession and free purchase remained vnto him that bought it. Moses receiued this disposition of his lawes from God, at such time as his flocks fed at the foote of the mountaine of Sinai, and hee gaue them in writing to the Hebrewes.

After that these lawes had bene after this manner digested, Moses addressed himselfe to the affaires & lawes of warre (forethinking him of those battels which should follow.) He therefore commaunded the gouernours of the tribes (the tribe of Leui onely excepted) to take a precise view and musters of those men that were capable and able to beare armes (for the Leuites were sacred and exempt from those functions) and the search being made, there were found sixe hundredth and three thousand, sixe hundredth and fiftie fighting men, betwixt the yeares of twentie, and fiftie. But in stead of Leui he chose Manasses, the sonne of Joseph; and Ephraim for his father Joseph: for so much had Jacob intreated at Joseph's hands, that hee would giue him his sonnes, that hee might adopt them (as it hath bene aforetime declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midst of the campe, guarded and defended with the tribes which were incamped thre by three on euery side. There were certaine wayes or paths likewise laid out betwene them, and a market place was quartered out, & shops traauailing in their shops; so that to looke vpon it, it resembled a Citie that marched and encamped.

The Priests first were planted next vnto the Tabernacle, and after them followed all the communitie of the Leuites (for there was a viewe also made of them, accounting all the males exceeding the age of thirtie dayes; and they were counted to be twentie and three thousand, eight hundredth and eightie.) And when it chanced that a cloud descended vpon the Tabernacle, then rested they, as if God thought good to rest in that place; and if it departed from the same, then removed they likewise. He inuented also a certaine kind of Cornet made of siluer, and framed after this manner. In length it was almost a cubit, and it was like the narrow whistle of a Fife, but a little more thicker, yet nathelesse, it was wide inough for the space of the mouth, to the end to receiue the breath, and the end thereof was made like a little Bell, in forme of a Trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew tongue Afotra. There were two of them, whereof the one of them serued to assemble and call the people to publike assemblies; and the other to conuocate the gouernours when they were to consult vpon affaires of estate: and if both of them were sounded, then all of them in general gathered together. When the Tabernacle was removed, this manner was obserued; As soone as the first charge was sounded, they that were encamped toward the East, first of all dislodged: at the second charge, they to the southward disincamped; then was the Tabernacle vnpitched, and caried in the midst, sixe of the tribes marching before, and sixe of them after: the Leuites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they sounded the third time, the quarter toward the West ward removed: & the fourth was that to the North ward. They made vse also of these Cornets in the diuine seruice, with which they ordered the sacrifices on the Sabbath and other dayes. Then also was the first Passeouer celebrated with solemn offerings after their departure out of Aegypt, they being in the desert.

Sedition against Moses through the scarcitie of victuals, and the punishment of the Rebellious.

Not long after this they removed their campe from the mountaine of Sinai; and after certaine encampings (of which we will speake) they came to a place which is called Iseremoth, where the people once more began to ruminare and reuine their seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage vpon Moses, objecting that by his perswasion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not onely that they were destitute of the plentie thereof, but also in stead of hoped felicitie, forced to wander here and there in extreame miserie, and traueled with want of water: and that if Manna likewise should in any sort faile them, they were like all of them without question to perish for want of sustenance. Herunto annexed they diuers contumelies, which were euery where inflicted against him, being a man of so great desert and consequence. Meane while there arose one amongst the people, who (admonishing them of the forepassed benefits receiued by the hands of Moses) counselled them to bee of good courage, assuring them that at that time they should not be frustrate either of that hope, or helpe, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incited against him by these words, and more & more whetted their spleenes against the prophet, who seeing them so desperate, willed them to be of a good courage, promising them, that although by iniurious speeches hee had vnderferuently bene offended by them, yet that he would giue them store of flesh, not for one day onely, but also for many. But they being incredulous (and some one amongst them demanding how he could make prouision for so many thousand men) God (saith he) and I, although we be euill spoken of by you, yet will we neuer desist to be carefull for you, and that shall you shortly perceiue. Scarce had he spoken this, but that all the campe was filled with quails, which they hunted for by heapes. Yet God not long after that, punished the insolencie and slander of the Hebrewes, by the death of no small number; for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cause was imposed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba, as if you should say, the monuments of concupiscence.

Of the spies that were sent to search the land of Canaan; and how returning to the Israelites, they amated them with feare.

Not long after that Moses had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a countrey not so apt for habitation (not farre from the borders of the Chanaanites, which is called the lawes) hee called the people to a counsell; and standing vp in the midst of them, hee spake after this manner. God (saith hee) hauing decreed to graunt you two great benefits, namely the libertie and possession of a happie countrey, hath graunted you alreadie the possession of the one, and will shortly make you partakers of the other. For wee are vpon the borders of Chanaan, from whence both the Cities and Kings are so farre from driving vs, as the whole nation being vnited together, is not of power to expell vs. Let vs therefore adresse our selues verie confidently to attempt the matter: for neither without fight will they resigne the title of their countrey vnto vs; neither without great conflicts may wee obtaine the palme of victorie. Let vs therefore send out certaine spies to search into the secrets of the countrey, and such as may coniecture how great their power is: but aboue all things, let vs bee at vnitic one with another, and let vs honour God, who assisteth vs in all daungers, and fighteth for vs. After that Moses had spoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counsels) chose twelue out of the most noblest families of the tribes, to goe and search the countrey, out of euery tribe one; who beginning from the parts extending towards Egypt, visited all the countrey of the Chanaanites, vntill they came to the Citie of Amathe, and the mountaine of Libanus; & hauing searched out both the land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home againe, hauing consumed fortie dayes in those affaires. Moreover they brought with the such fruits as the countrey yielded; & by the beautie thereof, & by the quantitie of those riches (which they reported to be in that countrey) they encouraged the hearts of the people to fight valiantly: but on the other side they dissuaded the with the difficultie of the conquest, saying, that there were certain riuers impossible to be ouerpassed, both for their greatnes & depth: that there were therein also inaccessible mountains,

A Regions beyond Euphrates a foure months iourney , to their great charges and with no lesse perill, to honour our Temple, and offer sacrifice, yet could they not obtaine licence or permission to offer, in that by our lawes it was not lawfull for them to do it : and some other without sacrificing (other some the sacrifice halfe finished, the rest not permitted to enter the Temple) have returned backe againe to their homes, without finishing their purposes, choosing rather to obey Moses law, then their owne wills : yet being reprov'd therein by none but their owne consciences. So much did the opinion once conceived of this man prevuaile , that hee is esteemed more then a man, who is supposed to have receiued lawes from God, and to have deliuered them to men. Of late also (not long before the warres of the Iewes, during the Empire of Claudianus, and Imael being high Priest amongst vs) when as so great a famine oppressed our nation, that an Assar was sold for foure drams, and there was brought to the feasts of Asymes the quantity of seauenty Cores (which make thirtie Sicilian , and fortie Athenian Medimni, which are two bushels of our almost) some of the Priests were not so bold as to eate one graine of Barley (notwithstanding the country was in that extremity) fearing the law, and Gods displeasure extended alwaies against sinnes concealed. For which cause we ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, considering that the writings left by Moses are in such force, euen at this day, that they themselves who hate vs, confesse that hee that hath instituted our gouernment is God, by the meanes and ministerie of Moses and his vertue. But of these things let every man thinke, as it pleaseth him.

Milest thus the Hebrewes passed their life in great penurie and perplexitie in the desert, groning vnder the burthen of their grieuous afflictions; there was nothing that more distracted and discompered them than this, that God had forbidden them to hazard or enter battell against the Chanaanites: neither would they now any longer giue care vnto Moses (who perswaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themselves, that both without his conduct and counsaile, they might easily obtaine victorie ouer their enemies: and accused him likewise, as if hee sought after no other thing, but that they beeing daily pressed with great wants, should bee enforced continually to depend vpon his counsels. Whereupon they embattailed themselves against the Chanaanites, presuming with themselves, that God would succour them, not onely in regarde of Moses; but also for that he had a general care of their nation, ever since the time of their forefathers; whom he had alwaies held vnder his protection; and by reason of whose vertues he had already granted them liberty. They said likewise, that if they would take the paines at that time and endeavour themselves, that God would alwaies fight with them: protesting that they were able to occurr the nations, although they were but themselves; yea although Moses would endeavour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was behouefull, that all of them should bee Lords of themselves, and that being recomfited and redeemed from the seruitude of Aegypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize ouer them, or to conformance their liues to his will; vnder this vaine beliefe, that God had onely discovered to Moses that which was behouefull for them, by reason of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not deriued from the loynes of Abraham, and that he onely were the mooue of all, in foreknowing the things that should happen vnto them, by particular instruction from God? That euen then they should seeme to be wise, if (condemning his pride, & fixing their trust vpon God) they would take possession of the cuntry which he had promised them, in spite of Moses contradiction; who for this cause hindred them, setting the name of God before them: that therefore putting before their eyes their necessity and the desert, which daily more and more aggravated their miserie, they should endeavour themselves courageously to fall out against the enemy the Chanaanites; alleading that God would bee their guide; so as they had no reason to expect the assistance of their lawmaker. At last when this sentence was approved by a generall allowance, they flocke out in multitudes against their enemies; who neither affrighted by their fierce assault, neither terrified with their infinite multitude, valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrewes beeing slaine) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turne their backs) euen vnto their campe. This overthrow (happning beside all mens opinion) wondrously delected the minds of the multitude, that they grew desperate of all future good fortune, concluding that God had sent and inflicted that plague vpon them, because without his counsell and fauour they had enterprised the battell. But when Moses perceived that both his owne countymen were dismayed with the overthrow which they had, and the enemy was waxen proude with their late victory, fearing likewise least (not content with their present successe) they should attempt further; he determined to retire his forces backe againe into the desert. And whereas the people promised thereafter to be obedient to him (being taught by their owne miserie, that nothing would fall out prosperously vnto them without the counsell and conduct of their guide) they disincamping themselves, retired into the desert vnder this resolution, that they would no more attempt the battell against the Chanaanites, before they received a signe of their good successe from heauen. But euen as in a great army it accustomedly falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax headstrong & disobedient to their gouernours; so did the like also happen amongst the Iewes: for whereas they were in number fixe hundred thousand, and euen in their better fortunes seemed disobedient to their gouernours, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants & misfortunes, both amongst themselves, & against their gouernour. For which cause there arose so great a sedition, as neither amongst the Greekes or Barbarians the like was neuer heard of: which things without doubt had overthrowne them (being brought into so desperate an estate) except Moses (forgetting the iniurie hee had received which

A which was no lesse then a pretence to stone him to death) had succoured and relieved their distressed fortunes. Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious against their lawe-maker, and transgressed also against the lawes which hee had deliuered them by Moses; yet deliuered he them out of that dangerous sedition, of which (without his especiall providence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable issue. This sedition, as also how Moses gouerned the estate when the troubles were ended, wee will now declare, hauing first expressed the cause thereof.

B The sedition raised by CHORE against MOSES and his brother for the Priesthood.

Chores (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongst the Hebrewes, and endowed with a certaine kinde of popular eloquence) seeing Moses placed in the highest estate of dignitie, was sore troubled and oppressed with enuie. For although he were of the same Tribe and kindred; yet thought he it to be a great indignity in himselfe to be helde his inferiour, being both more inabled in riches, and nothing inferiour in parentage: For vvhich cause hee began to mutine and murmur amongst the Leuites (which were of the same Tribe with him, and his kinsmen) telling them (in vehement discourse) that it was not to be suffered, nor permitted, that Moses, vnder a pretext of certaine diuinitie, should by ambitious policie (to other mens preiudice) only study his owne glory: shewing them how of late without all lawe and right hee had giuen the Priesthood to his brother Aaron, and distributed other dignities at his owne pleasure like a king, without the allowance and approbation of the people: That this iniury done by him was not to be endured; by reason that so couerly he had insinuated himselfe into the gouernement, that before he might be espied, the people should bee brought vnder seruitude: For hee that knoweth himselfe to bee worthy of a gouernement, strueth to obtaine the same by kind perswasions and consent of the people, and not by force and violence: but they that despaire by good meanes to attaine thereunto, doe notwithstanding abstaine from force, least they should lose the opinion of their goodnesse and honesty; yet endeavour they by malicious subtilties to attaine thereunto. That it concerned the common-weale to extinguish and roote out the subtile insinuations of such men, least of priuate, they should at last grow publike enemies. For what reason (said he) can Moses, yeeld, why he hath bestowed the Priesthood on Aaron and his sonnes? For if that God had decreed that this honour should be bestowed on one of the tribe of Leui, there were more reason that I should haue it, who am of the same kindred with Moses, & who surpasseth him both in riches & age: And if this honor appertained to the most ancient of the Tribes, that those of Rubens loynes ought by right to enioy it, namely Dathan, and Abiram and Phalal, who are the most ancient of that Tribe, and the most powerfull in riches. These things spake Chores (vnder colour and pretence of the weale of the common-weale, but in effect onely to raise a tumult amongst the multitude, and intrude into the office of the high Priest. This Discourse of his passing by little and little from one care to another amongst the multitude; and multiplied by the enuious, and such as maligned Aaron, at last brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: so that two hundred and fifty of the chiefe Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conspiracie, and all of these enforced themselves to take away the Priesthood from Moses brother, and to transferre it to him. The people likewise were in such sort incensed, as that they sought to stone Moses; and ran all of them by confused heapes with noise and vpror, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the tyrant was to bee cut off and the people deliuered from thraldome, who vnder pretext of religion; had insupportable thraldome imposed on them: For if it were God that had chosen him to be high Priest, he would haue preferred such a one to the dignity who had been worthy, and would not haue departed it to those who were far inferior to others; that if he had decreed to bestow it on Aaron, he had remitted the commission of his election to the people; and not left the disposition thereof to his brother. Moses, who long before that time had perceiued Chores treacherous slander, and saw the people very sore incensed; was notwithstanding nothing at all abashed thereat: but being resolved in his conscience that hee had gouerned the estate vprightly, and well assured that his brother obtained the Priesthood, not by his fauor but Gods election, he came into the congregatio; where he uttered no one word against the people: but addressing himselfe to Chore, he expostulated with him; and accused him in as much as was for him possible, being (besides his other qualities) fashioned & composed by nature G eloquently to speake in publique assemblies. I think (saith he) Chore, that both thou and every one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundred & fifty men of his faction) are worthy, of honour: yea I contemne not the rest of this assembly (although they are not to be compared with you in riches, and other endowments. For neither doth Aaron therefore possesse the Priesthood because he is richer (for thou hast more ample possessions then either of vs) neither because he is more noble (for God hath equally imparted the same vnto vs all, hauing giuen vs one & the same Grandfather) neither haue I been moued thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestowe that on him which was due vnto others. For had I not respected God and right in disposing of this dignitie; I had not forgotten my selfe, to further and preferre another, since there is no man more neerer my selfe then my selfe, or whom I had rather wish well too, then to my selfe: for what wilsome had it beene for me, to expose my selfe to those dangers which they incurre, who make breach of lawes, to suffer another man reap the fruits of my impietie? But God forbid that my conscience should be stained with any such sin: neither, were the fault mine also, would God leauie it vnpunished; neither in me, who should contemne him, neither in you, for that you were ignorant of that you ought to doe, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He himselfe it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this meanes hath acquired me of that accusation, that in this respect might be objected against me. For although Aaron hath obtained this degree (not by my fauour, but by Gods owne appointment) yet notwithstanding hee referreth and remit-teth the matter to the publique disposition and order of you all, neither requirerh he any prerogatiue (for that he hath already exercised the charge, or for that at this present it is granted him to entermiddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the greatest good fortune that may befall him, to see your mutinies and seditions cease; although with the losse of that honour, which he hath received from your owne election: for neither haue wee iniurius Gods will, in this that wee also wilshe your assent and allowance; but that which of his owne accord hee hath giuen, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe conscience: As reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable, that they which receiue it should alwaies enioy it, since God himselfe had giuen them ~~them~~ both the assurance and confirmation. God therefore shall once againe determine vho amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice vnto him, and to take charge of those things vvhich appertaine to pierie.

For it is a most absurd matter that Chore should haue power to desire a dignitie, and that God should be deprived of that authority to dispose the same as best liked him.
Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selues, and to bee troubled vpon these occasions:
and let euery one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his censur with perfumes, and fire from his house. But thou O Chore, giue place vnto God, and expect his election, neither arrogate to thy selfe a greater authoritie then God hath, but come thou also amongst the rest thy competitors in this honour, to heare his iudgement. Neither see I cause why Aaron should not bee there also present to bee iudged with thee, in that hitherto hee hath vertuously and vprightly behaved himselfe in the execution of that office, and is likewise of the sametribes and race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer incense in the presence of all the people, and when the perfume shall be past, let him whose sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high Priest: so shall I be acquit of that slander which I is wrongfully vrged against mee, whereby I am charged to haue (vpon my particular grace and fauour) bestowed the office of the Priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gaue ouer murmuring, and forbore to suspect Moses, allowing in themselves all that which had bene spoken, as being profitable for the Common-weale: so that hereupon they dismissed the assembly.

THE next day the people reassembled themselves together to assist the sacrifice, and to leare the suite decided amongst the Competitors; neither was this assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in insulpen in expectation of the euent, and some of them were desirous that Moses might be convicted of deceit. But such as were of the wiser sort, amongst them, desired an end of the sedition: for they feared lest the common weale should be utterly ruined, if the tumult should proceed any further. The multitude likewise (being naturall-

A ly desirous of noueltie, and prone to speake euill of their Magistrates) were diuersly disposed vpon euery occurrent. Moses also sent his seruants to Abiram and Dathan, to summon them to appeare (according to the covenants and accord) to attend the issue of the sacrifice. But their answer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moses by his subtilty and sinister deuices, should signiorize ouer the people. Which when Moses vnderstood, hee rooke diuers of the Elders amongst the people with him: and being no wayes moued with Dathan and his contumacie, he came vnto him (being willingly attended by those who were drawne to accompanie him.) Now when Dathan and his friends vnderstood that Moses with the Nobles came vnto them, both they, their wiues and children assembled themselues before the Tabernacle, expecting that which would ensue. They came likewise guarded with their seruants, who were armed to oppose themselves against Moses, if so be he should offer them any violence: But no sooner drew he neere vnto them, but that lifting vp his hands vnto heauen, he cried out with a loud voice in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this manner. O God (saith he) thou Lord ouer all that which either heauen, earth, or sea containeth, thou art a sufficient witnesse with me of all mine actions: for that I haue managed all things by thy will; and thou art he who hast giuen me power to execute my purposes: thou that alwayes in commiseration of the Hebrewes hast bene my perpetuall helpe and assistance, heare this my prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee; for which cause I hope thou wilt not disdain to testifie and iustifie my truth, and manifest the ingratitude of these men.
Thou doest exactly know the antiquitie of my race, not for that thou hast heard it, but for that thou hast seene and assisted it; in effect, now also testifie the truth for me in those things which these men (although they know the contrarie) are not ashamed to impute vnto me. At such time as I led a peaceable life, and that by my vertue and thy counsell, and my father in law Raguel fauour, I had sufficient to liue vpon; I forsooke the possession of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, to ingage my selfe in these miseries, which I haue suffered for these men: and first of all for their libertie, and now likewise for their safetie, I haue most readily vnder taken grieuous travels. Now therefore since I am growne into suspicion amongst those men, who by my care and providence haue escaped so many mischiefs and miseries; thou that appearedst vnto me in that fire on the mountaine of Sinai, and vouchsafedst both to speake vnto me, and to confirme me by the sight of miracles; that in thy name sentst me; messenger into Egypt; that hast abandoned the great fortunes of the Egyptians; and hast giuen me means to escape from their seruitude; and hast made Pharaos power and armie inferior to my fortunes; that when we were ignorant of our way gauest vs a passage through the sea, in whose bottom & wombe afterward the Egyptians were drowned; that gauest vs armes, when we were vnuenponed; that made the bitter water sauoury and fit to be drunke of; and in our scarcitie of water enforcedst drinke for vs out of the bowels of the hard rocke; when we found no meat on the land, didst send it vs from the sea; moreouer (as a thing neuer before heard of) affordedst vs meat from heauen, and hast established our estate with lawes and customes: Be thou, O Lord, my Iudge in all things, and my vnpartiall witnesse, that neither I haue bene corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, nor to fauour iniustice, neither that I haue suffered a poore man in his iust cause to lose his right against a rich aduersarie. And now hauing administred the common weale with all syceritie, I am called in question for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltlesse, as if I had bestowed thy Priesthood on my brother for priuate affection, and not for thy command sake: make it knowne that all things are dispensed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought to effect by casualty, but by thy especiall ordinance: And to expresse that thou hast care of the Hebrewes, testifie the same by thy iust punishment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuse thee to be insensible, and boast that thou art circumvented by my subtilties. But thou shalt make thy reuenge more notorious against the vnbridled detractioners of thy glorie, if they perish after no common manner, least any man should suspect that they suffer nothing inhumane: but let the earth which they vnworthily tread vpon, open it selfe and swallow them vp both with their families and sit-tunities. By this means both thy power will manifestly appeare vnto all men, and thou shalt leade an example to posteritie, that no man hereafter shall dare to thinke otherwise of thy maiesty then becometh him, & my ministerie shall be approued to proceed from thy direction. But if those crimes be truly vrged which are enforced against me, then let the caries returne and light on mine owne head, and let those whom I haue cursed lue in safetie. And thus exacting a punishment from those that disturbe thy people, keep the rest of the multitude in peace, concord, wicked men, for that it is contrary to thy iustice, that the innocent multitude of the Israelites should G answer their misdeeds, and suffer their punishments. Whilest he spake these words, and intermixed them with teares, the earth instantly trembled, and shaking began to remoue (after such a manner, as when by the violence of the wind a great billow of the sea floateth and waltereth.) Hereat were all the people amazed. But after that, a horrible and shattering noyse was made about their tents, the earth opened, and swallowed vp both them and all that which they esteemed deere, which was after a manner so exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld. Whereupon in a moment the earth closed againe, and the vast gaping was fast shut, so as there appeared not any signe of that which had hapned. Thus perished they all, leauing behind them an example of Gods power and iudgements. And this accident was the more miserable, in that there were no one, no not of their kinsfolke or allies that had compulsion of them: so that all the people H whatsoeuer forgetting those things which were past, did allow Gods iustice with ioyfull acclamations, esteeming them vnworthie to be bemoned, but to be held as the plague & peruersers of the people. After that Dathan with his family was extinguished, Moses assembled all those that contended for the Priesthood together, committing againe the election of the priesthood vnto God, concluding that the estate should bee ratified to him; whose sacrifice was most acceptable in Gods sight. For which cause the two hundred and fiftie men assembled themselves, who were both honoured for the vertue of their ancestors, and for their own abilities farre greater then theirs: with these also stood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their censers before the Tabernacle, with perfumes such as they brought with them; when suddenly so great a fire shon, as neither the like was euer kindled by mans hand, nor visually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was euer quickened in the woods, split and borne downe in the sommer time by a southerne brize, but such a one as seemed to be kindled in heauen most brightsome and flaming: by force and power whereof those two hundred and fiftie (together with Chore) were so consumed, that there scarce appeared any reliques of their carcases: Only Aaron remained vntouched, to the end it might appeare that this fire came from heauen. These things thus brought to passe, Moses (intending to leaue a perpetuall memory to posteritie of that punishment) to the end they should not be ignorant thereof, commaunded Elezar the sonne of Aaron to consecrate their censers affixed to the brazen Altar, that by reason of this monument, all men might be terrified, who thinke that the diuine power can be circumvented by humane policy.

What things hapned in 38. yeares space to the Iebrewes in the desert.

After that by so euident an argument it appeared very sufficiently, that Aaron neither by sinister insinuations, neither by the fauour of his brother, but onely by Gods election had obtained the Priesthood; he euer afterwards held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the sedition was not sufficiently ceased, but that it brake out with a more yrgent furie then at first: for it tooke his originall from such causes that it might easily appeare, that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perswasion had once taken roote in the hearts of men, I that nothing is brought to passe without Gods will, they imagined that God wrought these things in fauour of Moses; to him therefore imputed they all these things, as if God had not punished those men thorow the hate he bare against their sins, but only on Moses solicitation: and they were foreaggrued that Moses (hauing giuen this mayme vnto the people, by the losse of so many noble men, that onely perished thorow the zeale they bare to Gods seruice) not onely had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had assured the Priesthood to his brother after such a manner, that thereafter no man durst oppose himselfe to purchase the same; seeing how vnfortunately those others were ouerthrowne by a violent death. Moreouer the kindness of those that were slaine, solicited and stirred the people, praying them to restraine the pride and ouer great power of Moses, in that it lay in their power easily to performe the same. But Moses perceiuing M that the people was incensed, & fearing least once more they should be thinke them on some inno-uacion, whereby some great misfortune might succede, he assembled them together, and gaue audience to their accusations: & without replying any waies (for feare he might the more incense them) hee onely commaunded the heads of the tribes, that each of them should bring a rod, wherein the name of each tribe should be written, promising that the Priesthood should re-maine with them, in whose rod God should shew any signe. Which iudgement of his being allowed

A loved by all men, both they, and Aaron brought their rods with their inscriptions; & Aaron had written in his, the tribe of Leui. These Moses tooke from them, and laid them in Gods Tabernacle: the next day he brought them forth euery one of them (which were easily knowne to bee those which the Princes brought, & the rest of the people had marked) and they saw that all theirs remained in the same forme which the day before they retained, when Moses tooke them; but out of Aarons rod there grew branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kind of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amazed at the noueltie of this spectacle (dismissing their hatreds wherewith they both prosecuted Moses & Aaron) became wholly amazed and drawne into admiration of Gods iudge-ment, and forbore any more to repugne against God, or to oppose themselves against Aarons Priesthood. And thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all mens consent he B became hie Priest; and the people of the Iebrewes turmoyled with long seditions, at last by this meanes grew settled in peace and quietnes. But after that Moses had made the tribe of Leui (which was dedicate to Gods seruice) free and exempt from warfare (for feare least being occupied in providing themselves necessities for their maintenance, they should grow negligent in executing their duties in sacrifice) he ordained that after the land of Chanaan was conquered by their forces and Gods fauour, that of the Cities they should conquer, they should distribute fortie eight of the best & fairest on the Leuites, & certain lands abutting on their Cities, to the quantity and space of two thousand cubits. Moreouer, he commaunded that the tenths of all the yearly fruit that was gathered by the whole people, should be giuen and bestowed on the Leuites C and Priests; and euer after this tribe had their solemne reuenues. Now must I declare what things are proper to the Priests. Of the fortie eight Cities which were granted to the Leuites, he commaunded them to graunt thirteene to the Priests; and that of those tenths which they receiued of the people, they should pay vnto them a tenth share. Besides, he gaue charge that the people should offer vp vnto God all the first fruits of whatsoeuer the earth yeelded them: and that the first borne of foure footed beasts dedicated for sacrifice, if it were a male, should be deliuered to the Priests to sacrifice, to the end they might be nourished with all their family in the sacred Ci-tie of Ierusalem; and that they which are not fit to be sacrificed to God, should be eaten by them according to the vse and custome of the countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firstling a sicle and a halfe, and for the first borne of a man, five sicles. He allotted them likewise the first D fruits of sheep-shearing, and ordered that the bakers should offer them some cakes. But they that consecrate themselves by vow, and are called Nazarites (nourishing their haire, and tasting no wine) when as they consecrate their haire, were bound to offer it vnto the Priests. They likewise who call themselves Corban, which is called the gift of God, if they desire to be dismissed from that ministerie (whereunto by voluntarie vow they bound themselves) must pay money to the Priests, for a woman thirtie sicles, for a man fiftie; and that those that had not so much money, should be left to the discretion of the Priests. And if any man should kill (for his priuate feault) any beast, and not for Gods seruice, yet that he ought to offer vnto the Priest the breast and leg of the beast. This is that allowance which Moses ratified to the Priests, and besides this, whatsoever the people offered for sinnes (as we declared in the next precedent volume.) And what-E soeuer was contributed by the people to the order of the Priests, hee commaunded that both their wiues, children and seruants should be made partakers of the same (onely except those things which were offered for sinne offerings, for these things the Priests onely themselves eate vp in the Temple the same day.) After that this policy was in this sort ratified by Moses, & that the mutinie was appeased, he removed his campe, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumæa, where he sent Embassadors to the King thereof, requiring him to grant him and his free passage (and offering him such and so sufficient pledges, as he should esteeme and reckon of, to assure him that no violence or iniurie should be offered; assuring him to make payment for whatsoeuer victuall or drinke, eyther he or his army should receiue.) But he setting light by their Embassage, denied them passage, and with a well furnished armie marched forth against Moses F to withstand him, if contrary to his will hee should attempt to passe thorow his countrey.
And for that God had not counselled Moses to begin the combate, if he were informed by the e-nemie, he retired backe againe, determining to seeke his passage athwart the desert. At that time died his sister Mary, the fourth yeare after their departure out of Egypt, & the first Moone of the moneth Xantique: he was magnificently entombed at the common charge, on a certaine mountaine called Sein: and after the people had mourned for her fortie daies, hee purified them after this manner. The Priest taking a yong heifer (which had neuer as yet borne yoke

A man that is cleansed putteth it in a cleane place, and they that are vnclane by meanes of one that is dead, put a little of these ashes into a fountaine with Hyssope, and after they haue mixed the ashes in the fountaine, they besprinkle themselves three times, and on the seventh day, and after that are they purified. He likewise ordained that the like purification should be vsed, when a man should take possession of his inheritance.

But after the army (that had so long mourned the dead sister of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the desert into Arabia; and arriuing in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitane citie, in times past called Arce, and at this present Petra) which is inuironed with a high mountaine; Aaron ascended the said mountaine, & Moses shewed him the place, where he should yeeld vp his soule vnto God; and in the sight of all the army standing on a high place, he put off his stoale, and gaue it to his sonne Eleazar, to whom by eldership the succession appertained: and thus (in the sight of the people) he died in that verie yeare wherein hee lost his sister; and in the hundreth, twentie and third yeare of his age: he departed on the newe moone, in the moneth of August (called by the Athenians Hecatombeon, by the Macedonians Ious, and Sabba by the Hebrewes.) The people mourned for him for the space of fortie daies, and then desisted. Moses displaced his campe from thence, and pitched his tents neere vnto a riuer called Arnon (which springeth from the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth along the desert, and then entereth into the Alphaltique lake, separating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The country is fertile and sufficient to yeeld fruit to all the inhabitants in great foison: to Sehon King of this country Moses sent Embassadors, requiring passage thorow his kingdome, vnder such assurance as should best please him, that no wrong should be offered, neither to his country, nor the inhabitants thereof, assuring him to pay the price of what fouer his soldiers tooke either in victuals or water. But Sehon refused him, and arming his people, pitched his tents on the banks of Arnon, being readie to repulse the Hebrewes if they presumed to passe the riuer.

BUt when Moses perceiued that the Amorites were disposed to hostilitie; for which cause supposing that the iniury and contempt was not to be endured, and seeing the Hebrewes were an intractable kind of men (and such as either by idleness or want, might be easily perwaded to renue their former seditions and tumults, and being willing to preuent all these occasions) he asked counsell at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his passage by the sword. Now when God had allowed his purpose, and besides that promised him the victory, he was greatly confirmed in hope, and animated and encouraged his soldiers, telling them that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprise their long desired warre with Gods fauour, and his approbation and encouragement: who reioycing at this libertie that was granted them, sodainly tooke armes, and in a set battell hastened to charge the enemy. On the other side the Amorite (as soone as he saw them march forward, and begin the onler) forgetting his former fiercenes was both himselfe terrified, and his soldiers likewise (who before the sight of their enemies were as cruel and bloody as Lions) now waxed as feareful and as meeke as Lambs. So that they scarcely had endured the first assault, but that they fled, reposing the whole hope of their prosperitie in their retreat: they trusted likewise to their walled townes (which notwithstanding did nought at all auail them.) For no sooner did the Hebrewes perceiue that their enemies began to trust their feete and that their ranks were broken, but they more freshly pursued them, and brought them into extreme feare: so that being vtterly put to flight and disperfed vpon the field, they were inforced to flie vnto their Cities. Yet ceased not the Hebrewes to pursue them more fiercely, but began more and more to molest them with those kind of weapons wherein they were exercised before time: for being expert and well trained in the sling and bow, and perfect in casting the dart, and nimble in bodie (by reason of their light armours) they ran after their enemies,

A enemies, and with their shafts and bowes shot at those which were a farre off, and might not be ouertaken. So that there followed a most huge slaughter, and they that escaped were grievously wounded: yet were they more afflicted with thirst then any other hostilitie (in that it was sommer time) so that all those that went to refresh & coole their thirst at the riuer (besides all those that had turned their backs to flie) were pursued with all kinds of misile weapons and darts vntill they were all slaine. The king Sehon himselfe also was slaine in this fight. And the Hebrewes spoyled those that were slaine, & carried away great store of pillage. They had likewise great foyson and abundance of all kinds of fruits (in that the haruest was not as yet gathered.) Thus passed the Armie through the whole country, foraging and spoyling the same without any resistance, by reason that the enemy was discomfited, & that all his forces in warre were defeated. This was the destruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither vsed their counsell prudently, nor managed their warre valiantly. But the Hebrewes occupied their country (situate betwene three riuers, after the manner of an Island.) For the banks of Arnon do terminate the Southerne coasts thereof, and Jabacchus the Northerne, which flowing into Jordan, leeseeth his name: now the Westerne coast is watered by the riuer of Jordan. Amidst this prosperous estate of the Israelites, there arose a new enemy against them, called Og, king of Galadine, & of the countries of Gaulanitis, who came as a friend and companion to assist Sehon; who seeing his fortunes and estate to desolage and desperate, yet in hope to obtaine the victorie, determined to make triall both of his owne mens vertue, and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for he both died in the battaille, and his whole host was likewise discomfited. But Moses no sooner ouerpasse the flood of Jabacchus, but that entering *Og*s kindome, hee ouerthrew one citie after another, and destroyed all the inhabitants thereof (who for riches and fruitfull pastures exceeded all other men of that country.) Og also was a man of a most heroicke and high stature, and nothing inferiour thereunto either in strength or vertue; the argument of whose strength and stature was extant in the sacke of the chiefe citie & palace of the country of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron bed found of foure cubits breadth, and nine in length. The fall of this man did not only further the present felicity of the Hebrews, but also became the cause of many their future and more fortunate successes: for they tooke sixtie wel fortified cities which were vnder his gouernment; and what with their priue preyes and publike pillage, they were all enriched. After this Moses remoued his campe toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad plaine neere vnto the Citie of Iericho (which is rich and fruitfull, and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the minds of the Israelites in such sort confirmed, as they desired nothing more then warre, and battell; and Moses thinking good to make vse of this their forwardnesse, (hauing sacrificed to God in way of thanksgiuing, and feasted the people) hee sent part of them armed to destroy the country of the Madianites, and to spoile the cities of that region: the cause of which warre had this originall.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

EHen Balaam king of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites) saw the Israelites increase to such greatnesse, he began to suspect the securitie of his owne fortune and estate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrewes to couet to possesse any other Country but the land of Canaan, and therefore more rashly then prudently he bethought him of new matters; and for that hee durst not assaile them in battell, whom he knew to be puffed vp with the successe of many victories (yet desirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he sendeth Embassadors to the Madianites to consult with them, as concerning their common profit. They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous Diuine called Balaam (who was their especiall friend) sent some of their most honourable princes together with *Balaam*s Embassadors, beseeching him that he would come vnto them and curse the Israelites. The Prophet intreating the Embassadors with great humanitie, and feasting them at his owne table, asked counsaile of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands: but seeing that God forbade him to obey them, he returned vnto them, and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withstood him; whose mercie he ascribed the glorie which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies: for that armie which they desired should be curied, was dearly beloued of God. For which cause he gaue them counsell, that seeking out the Israelites, they should make peace with them them vnder whatsoeuer conditions: which said, he dismissed the Embassadors. But the Madi- nites (being instantly requested by Balaam) once more sent their Embassadors vnto Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to satisfie them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (of- fended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadors: & he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadors. But as he trauelled vpon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certaine narrow way, betwene two mounds or wals made of stones; which when the Ass perceived whereon Balaam was mounted, he star- ted out of the way, and thrust Balaam, and crushed him against one of the wals; and neither by the strokes which his rider gaue him (being sore grieved by his bruiſe) nor by any other meanes might he be drawne forward. And when as neither the Angel forooke the way, neither the Pro- phet gaue ouer tormenting the Ass, at length the beast falling downe by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice; blaming him, for that hauing neuer before that time receiued damage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beate him; considering that he vnderstood not that God did prohibit him from the performance of that which hee desired. Whilest thus he was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Ass, an Angell appeared vnto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Ass was not in the fault, but that he hindered his journey, by reason hee attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the Prophet terrified, addrest himselfe to returne backe againe: but God commanded him to prosecute that journey which he had intended, charging him to declare and doe that which hee should aduise and instruct him in.

Balaam com- meth to Balaam.

After that God had giuen him this charge, he went vnto Balaam, who entertained him honour- ably, and caused him to be brought to a certaine mountaine, from whence he might behold the Hebrewes campe. Balaam also himselfe being royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, con- ducting him honourably vnto a certain mountaine, which ouerhung the Israelites, being seven score furlongs from their campe. Which when he perceived, he caused the king to build seven Altars, on which he laid seven Bulles, and seven Rams. All which being readily executed by the king, he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end hee might preface and fore-prophecie the victorie:

Balaams pro- phetic of the people of Is- rael.

“which done, he spake after this manner. Happy are you, on whom God bestoweth so large a bles- sing and abundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his prouidence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. Because there is not any sort of men, before whom in innocencie of maners and studie of honestie and vertue, you are not to be preferred: your successours also shall haue a more fa- mous posteritie, because amongst men God onely fauoureth you, and taketh care that no na- tion vnder the Sunne shall either exceede or equall you in happinesse. You shall likewise possesse that land whereto hee hath sent you: and your posteritie shall be perpetuall Lords thereof; and the glorie of your name shall fulfill both the whole earth, and sea; and so shall your nation bee multiplied, that there shall be no nation of the world that shall not bee intermixed with your blood and line. Blessed are you (most worthie armie) and deservng great admiration, hauing your increase thus multiplied by the means of one parent. For the land of Canaan at this present shall entertaine you, but in little number; but know that hereafter the whole world is destina- ted for your habitation: so that both in the Islands, and in the continent you shall liue in so great number, that you shall equall the starres of the firmament. And whereas you are like to growe so innumerable, yet notwithstanding he shall not suffer you to want the utmost of plentie and abundance; neither in warre shall hee cease to animate and leade you against your enemies. Let your enemies resolue to take armes and to assault you, yet shall there no one returne from them to beare message of the victorie, or to bring glad tidings to their wiues and children. This prou- dence and prowesse is giuen you by Gods prouidence, who onely can and may abate the power of greatnesse, and repaire the weakenesse of obscuritie. Thus spake the Wisard in his propheti- call spirit, being transported beyond himselfe, and rauished with a supernaturall fire. But Balaam was sore incensed against him, exclaiming that he had not kept couenant, although by great re- wards he had been by his Confederate drawne thither to curse them, vrging it against him, that in stead of execrations against them, he had published their pietie and praises. To whom the Pro- phet made this anſwer: Thinkest thou (said he) that it lieth in our power, as often as destinies are to be discouered, to speake or conceale what we list, at such time as God speaketh in our mouth? neither we know, nor euer thought vpon. Verily I sufficiently remember wherunto I was perswa- ded by the sollicitation of the Madianites, & for that cause came I hither, to execute that which they extorted from my hands; but God is more powerfull then my will, who contrarie to the

The year of the world, 2493. before Christ's birth 1471. The second Embassage to Balaam.

A will of God, and for the particular fauour of men, had purposed to speake otherwise: but as soone as he entred into our hearts, there remaineth no more of our felues in our felues. Truly I had de- termined in my self to speak nothing in their praises, neither was it in my mind to reckon vp what God had decreed to bestow vpon that nation, but the fauorable power which befriended them, & studieth nothing more then the felicity & glory of that nation, hath in his prescience put these words into my mouth: now therefore (since it is my desire to gratifie both thee, & the Madianites, whose praier I ought not but admie) go to let vs erect new Altars, and prepare fresh sacrifice, and make trial if perhaps God will be moued to grant melicence to curse these kind of men. Herevnto Balaam gaue his content, yet did not God ratifie those his imprecations made against the Israelites, notwithstanding he had sacrificed twice; so that falling on his face, hee declared the occurrences of their kingdoms and commonweales, of most esteeme (of which some one were not as yet buile) and such things likewise as should thereafter happen to those men both by land and sea, euen to our dayes: out of all which things (accomplished according to his predictions) we may gather most assuredly that, which of his prophetic is to be fulfilled, will surely take effect. Balaam being sore displeased, because the Israelites could not be cursed, sent Balaam backe againe without honor: who returning homewards (at such time as he came vnto Euphrates) called Balaam and the Princes of the Madianites, & spake thus vnto them. Balaam & you Princes of Madian, it be- hooueth me to gratifie you (although it be against the will of God) for which cause giue eare vnto me: All the sorts of death that may be to the vttermoſt, cannot extinguish the race of the Hebrewes: neither by warre or pestilence, or famine, or any other chance may they be ruined: for God hath care to preſerue that nation from all euill, so that no slaughter can fall vpon them, whereby the whole multitude shall be extinguished: yet in the meane while some things may not be auoyded, whereby afflicted for a time, they may presently flourish more then they did be- fore, being by such a chastisement reduced to better health. For which cause if you seeke to ob- taine some short victorie ouer them, by this my counsell you shall bring your wishes to effect. Send me the fairest of your daughters, as trimly decked & beautified as is possible, who by their beautie may conquer, and by their loue allure their hearts; let these wander about their campe, and offer themselves to entertaine a familiar embrace, if by the young men they shall be solici- ted thereunto: and as soone as they shall espie them to bee surprised with desire, let them sodain- ly breake from them; and when as they shall be required by them to stay, let them not yeeld, ex- cept they will be perswaded to forsake their country lawes, and the seruice of God from whom they receiued them, and honour the Gods of the Madianites, and Moabites. For by this meanes shall they incense Gods wrath against themselves. Which when he had certified and admonished them of, he departed. Now when the Madianites (according as they were counselled) sent out their daughters, the yonger sort of the Hebrewes were intangled with the beautie of the damels: and growing in talke with them, they prayed them that they would not enuie them the opportunitie to reape the pleasure and inioymnt of their beautie, neither that they would disdain their in- tercourse: they willingly both admit the wordes, and the embraces of the young men, and ha- uing well hette them with dalliance, they addrest themselves to leaue them in the heat of their desires. Whereupon they discomforted at the womens departure, did instantly intreat them, that they should not in that sort forsake them, but that in hope of future marriage and possession of their greatest goods, they should remaine and dwell with them. These promises they confirmed with oathes, and sealed with teares, calling God to witnesse (the rather to perswade and con- forme them vnto mercie) whereupon they (after they perceived that they were surprised, and be- sorted with their companie) answered after this manner. Valiant young men; wee want not at home neyther ample faculties, or the affections of our parents, and domesticall friends; nei- ther come we hither vnto you for want of these things; neither admit wee your prayers, in that we meane to make file of our beauties: but being perswaded that you are honest men, we haue not disdained to entertaine you with this gracious hospitalitie, in that we see ye had need thereof, and for that cause haue we shewed our felues courteous vnto you: now therefore because you say you loue vs, & that you are sore agreeued at this our departure, we haue thought good not to gainſay your intreaties: if therefore you will plight your faith, and promise vs marriage (which thing onely is that which must satisfie vs) we will willingly liue with you as your lawfull wiues; but we feare least when your lusts are satisfied, you should with iniurie and contumelie, send vs backe againe to our parents: to which suspect of ours it becommeth you (if you so please) to giue a lawfull pardon. But they promised to giue their faith in what manner soeuer, & refused no con- dition (by reason of their extreame loue.) Wel then (said the virgins) since that you are so pleased, and that you haue manners so different from others, that you also use your proper meates according to your peculiar manner, neither can you endure that your drinke be common with other mens; it behoueth you if you will liue with vs, to adore our gods: For by no other argument may you perswade vs that your loue is vnfaigned, except you honour as we doe the same gods: neither shall you be blamed if you honour the Gods of that countrey, into which you are come, considering that our gods are common vnto all nations, whereas your God is adored by none other but your selues. It behoueth you therefore (saide they) to conforme your selues in opinion with other men, or that ye seeke out another world, wherein you might liue solely according to your particular policie and religion.

The Hebrewes blinded with the loue which they bare vnto the virgins, conceiued well of their words, & consented to that which they said, suffering themselves to be seduced according as they were invited; so that they transgressed the ordinances of their fathers, in following strange gods; to whom they purposed to do sacrifice according to the maner of the country. They tooke pleasure also to eat strange kinds of meats which were prohibited them by the law, & addicted themselves to all kinds of pleasure, according as the women perswaded them, so that the whole army was infected with a dissolute disorder (amongst the younger sort) & a worse mutiny arose thereby then the precedent, wherethrough it was to be suspected, least the whole course of law and gouernment should be permitted. For the youth hauing once had a touch of these forraign & lasciuious fashions, were vnassably transported with the same: and if there were any more excellent then others in nobilitie, they together (with the rest of the multitude) were richly corrupted. Zambrias also of the tribe of Simeon (& one of the Princes among the) marrying Cosbi the Madianite (daughter vnto Phinees a gouernour of that country) at the commandement of his wife, & in contempt of Moses lawes, for her sake did sacrifice after a forraign maner, & contrary to the law disposed with his forraigne wife which was a stranger. During this estate of affaires, Moses being afraid least some more grievous mischiefe should succede, called the people together, accusing no man in particular, (for that he was vnwilling to draw the into desperation, who whilst they think they lie hidden, may be reduced to a better mind) but he told them that it was a thing vnworthy & ill becomming themselves or their elders, that they should set more by their pleasures, then by God and their religion. That it behoued them whilst they had time, to repent themselves, & that they shewed themselves to be valiant men, not by contempt of lawes, but by appeasing their disordinate desires. Besides he told them that it was an absurd thing, that whereas in the desert they liued modestly, they should now in a plentiful countrey grow so dissolute and disordinate, as to lose that by affluence which they had got by temperance. In such like speeches he inducured to correct the youth, and to reduce them to a better mind: whereupon Zambrias rising vp, spake after this manner. Moses (saide he) use thou thine owne lawes (whereunto by long use thou hast added strength and confirmation) which hadst thou not done, oft times ere this hadst thou suffered punishment, and learnt (to thine owne miserie) that the Hebrewes were not to be deluded: for my selfe thou hast neuer tie me to thy tyrannicall decrees, for hitherto hast thou inducured nought else, but vnder pretext of law & religion to bring vs into seruitude and subiection; and thy selfe by thy subtil and sinister meanes, to honour and soveraintie; taking from vs the pleasures and libertie of our liues (things that belong to free men, and such as appertaine or liue not vnder any mans gouernment.) For this should be worse then in Aegyptian thraldome, to punish euery man by thy lawes, according to thine owne pleasure; whereas thou thy selfe art more worthy to be punished, in that thou disannulst that thing which is approved by all mens consent: and desirest that thy decrees should be of more force, then all the resolutions of all other mortall men whatsoeuer. But I (as touching that which I doe) in that I suppose it to be well done, am not afraid to confesse in this assembly, namely, that I haue taken a stranger to wife: thou bearest mine actions from mine owne mouth, as from a free and resolute man, neither dost thou desire that they should be hidden. I likewise sacrifice to the gods contrarie to our custome, because I suppose it to be both iust and necessarie, that from many I seeke the truth, and not (depending as it were vpon a tyranny, or liuing thereunder) to build my faith vpon one only: for no man shall please me that will haue more interest in mine actions then my selfe. Whilst Zambrias alleged this both for himselfe and other of his faction; the people silently expected the issue of this audacious boldnesse, especially for that they saw their lawmaker would not contend any longer: least he should make an insolent man more outrageous, for he feared least diuers such in imitation of him growing impudent in their speeches, should stirre up tumults amongst the people: so that the assembly for this time was after this maner dissolved, and perhaps this mischiefe had taken further head Zambrias and Moses accuseth the Hebrewes of Idolatrie & voluptuousness.

Zambrias oration against Moses.

The year of the world 2493. The daughter of Madias allureth the Israelites to Idolatrie.

The Hebrewes blinded with the loue of the women revolt to the lawes of their fathers.

A head, except Zambrias had bene sodainly cut off, by such a meanes as ensueth. Phinees (both in respect of other things, as also the dignitie of his father, the chiefe among the youths, and the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest, whose great vnkle Moses was) was grievously discontented with Zambrias contumacie, and least by his impunitie the law might grow into contempt, he resolved to be reuenged vpon the transgressors, being well assured how much the example of great men preuaileth on both parts: and whereas he was of so much strength of mind and of bodie, as that he would not attempt any thing rashly which he would not bring to issue, he repaired to Zambrias tent, and at one stroke slue both him and Chosbi his wife. By whose example the rest of the youth (being exasperated by this his worthie act) enforced themselves to do iustice on those that had committed the like offence; so that they slew a great part of them by the sword, and the rest by the pestilence (which was inflicted by Gods iudgement on them) were utterly rooted out. Neither spared he those, who though by reason of consanguinity they ought to haue restrained & dissuaded their kinsmen from lewdnes, yet had rather either dissemble, or kindle their lust in them, then counsaile them; neither intermitted he from punishing those men till foureteene thousand of them were done to death by sickness. For which cause Moses (being incensed against the Madianites) sent out an army to destroy that nation (of which expedition we will presently discourse, after that we haue annexed that which was omitted in this historie.) For reason would that we should not pretermitt to praise the designe of our lawmaker in this behalfe. For in regard of Balaam, (sought out by the Madianites vnder the intent to curse the Hebrewes, although he could not do it, being hindered thereto by the prouidence of God, who notwithstanding gaue that counsel to the enemy, by means whereof within a little space a great multitude of the Hebrewes were corrupted in their course of life, & diuerse haue bene grievously plagued with sickness) in regard I say of this Balaam, he hath greatly honoured him in chronicling his predictions in his writings. And although it had bene easie for him to haue depriued him of the glorie, and to haue appropriated it to himselfe, by reason that there was not any witness that might contradict him; yet neglected he not to giue testimonie of him, and to make mention of him in his writings: Yet let euery one thinke of this according as it shall seeme good vnto him. But Moses (as I began to say) sent an army of twelue thousand men against the Madianites, chusing out of euery tribe one thousand souldiers, and appointed Phinees, captaine ouer these forces, by whose industrie (as a little before I haue declared) both the lawes were satisfied, and Zambri (that brake the same) was punished.

Phinees thrusteth Zambri and Chosbi thorow at one time.

CHAP. VII.

The Hebrewes fight against the Madianites, and overcome them.

But the Madianites (hauing intelligence that their enemies drew neere vnto them, and that they were not farre off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and being all those passages of their countrey, by which they thought their enemy might breake in, addressing themselves to repulse them with force and valour: but no sooner did Phinees with his forces charge them, and set vpon them, but that (vpon the first encounter) so great a multitude of the Madianites was slaine, that the number of the carcasses might not be accounted: neither were their kings in like sort saued from the sword. These were Og, Sures, Rebeas, Ybes, & the fifth Rekemus (from whom the chiefe Citie of the Arabians deriueth his name, and at this day the Madianites retaineth the same, and is called Recome, which the Grecians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrewes hauing thus put their enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and caried and droue away with them a great prey; and killing all the inhabitants thereof both men & women, they only spared the virgins (for this command had Phinees receiued from Moses hands) who returning home with his armie in safety, brought with him a memorable and mightie prey, of Oxen, fiftie and two thousand, sixtie and seven: of Ases, sixtie thousand: of golden and siluer vessels a great number: which those of that countrey were wont to use in their domesticall affaires.) For by reason of their great riches, they liued verie delicately: there were also led captiue from thence about thirtie thousand virgins. But Moses (diuiding the prey) gaue the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar and the Priests, and to the Levites another fiftie: as for the remainder he distributed it amongst the people. Whence it came to passe, that euer afterwards they liued in great security, hauing gotten riches by their vertue, & peace also to enioy the same. Now for that Moses was well stricken in yeares, he appointed Iesus (who if need were might succcede him in the offices, both of a Prophet and a Prince and Gouverneur; for God had so commaunded that hee should make choise of him) to bee his successor in the principallitie. For he was most expert in all diuine and humane knowledge; being therein instructed by his maister Moses. About that time, the two tribes of Gad and Ruben, with the halfe tribe of Manasse (being abundantly stored with cattell, and all other manner of riches) by common consent belought Moses that hee would giue and assigne to them in particular the Countrey of the Amorites, which not long since they had conquered by the sword, for that it was full of rich pastures. But hee (suspecting least surpris'd with feare, they did detract and withdraw themselves from the battell of the Chanaanites, and that vnder the pretext of the care of their cattell, they couered their sloth) highly taunted and controuled them, saying that they were fearefull dissemblers: He accus'd them likewise, that their desire was to possesse that land, which was conquered by the common valour of the people, to the end they might lead their liues in idleness and pleasure; and that bearing armes with the rest of the host, they would not helpe to possesse the land beyond Iordan which God had promised them, by overcoming those nations which hee commaunded them to account for their enemies. Who perceyuing that hee was displeased (least hee should seeme to be deserv'dly incens'd against them) answered, that neither thorow feare they fled danger, neither by reason of sloth shunn'd labour, but only shor at this, that leaving their prey in commodious places, they might bee more fit to enter conflict: saying, that they were ready (if so bee they might receiue Cities for the defence and receit of their wiues, children, and substance) to follow the rest of the armie whither soeuer they were conducted; and to aduenture their liues with them for the common successe. Whereupon Moses (allowing their forwardnesse, and assembling Eleazar the high Priest, and Iesus, with the rest of the Magistrates) graunted them the land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the people ioyned vnto them in consanguinitie) they should warfare against their common enemy, till all things were accomplished according to their desires: and by this means hauing receiued that which they demanded, and building them called Cities, they left their children, wiues, and substance in the same. Moses also builded ten Cities in that Region (which are to bee reckoned in the number of those fortie and eight) in three whereof hee appointed sanctuaries and places of refuge, which they onely might take benefite of, who fledde thither for chaunce-meddlie; and he appointed them their terme of exile till such time as the high Priest died, vnder whom the manslaughter was committed: at such time they might safely returne into their Countrey. And during the time of their exile, it was lawfull for any of the kinne to take reuenge against the offender by his death, onely at such time as he found him without the Citie of refuge: and that right he onely ratified to those that were akinne, but not vnto others. Now the Cities of refuge were these: in the confines of Arabia, Bozora: in the region of Galadana, Arimanum: in the countrey of Bataneades, Gaulademman. And after the conquest of Chanaan so many Cities of the Leuites (by the commaundement of Moses) were appointed to that end that they might giue refuge and habitation to such sort of offenders. At that time when one of the Magistrates called Salpades, of the tribe of Manasse, was dead (and had onely left behind him children of the worse sexe) the gouernours of the tribe came vnto Moses, and asked his counsell, whether in the distribution of the lands, they should leaue out any part or portion for them: who answered them, that if they married within their tribe, they should haue their dowrie; but if they made choise to handfast themselves in another tribe, that then they should leese their patrimonie in their owne: and for this cause made he this ordinance, to the end that euery tribe should continually possesse his proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but thirtie dayes onely, to fulfill the number of those fortie yeares since their departure out of Egypt, hee (summoning an assemblie in that place nere to Iordan, where now the Citie of Abila is situat, enuironed with a field beset with Palme trees) as soone as he saw the people addressed to heare him, spake vnto them after this

Moses Lawes, and how he was taken out of this world from the company of men.

MY deare friends and fellow soldiers, companions in my long trauell, since it is so thought requisite by God, and mine age (attayning to the full number of one hundred and twentie yeares) requireth no lesse, but that I must depart out of this life; and since it seemeth not good in Gods sight, that either I should bee agent, or assistant in your affaires beyond Iordan: I haue thought it requisite that (in as much as appertaineth to your felicitie) I should not now also faile or default in my dutie towards you; but that according to the grace that is giuen me, I should provide that by laying open the way vnto you that leadeth to the same, I may seeme worthe amongst you to merit eternal glorie & memorie. Giue therefore care vnto me, that when as I haue first declared vnto you, wherein both your felicitie, and the happines of your posterity consisteth, & haue left this perpetual testimonie and monument of my intire loue towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: for well I know that I deserue to be credited by you, both for that before times I haue incessantly (in studying for your profites) neuer deceiued you, as also for that the soule (being ready to bee separated from the bodie) becommeth more accomplished in all vertue and veritie. Ye sonnes of Israel, there is but one onely cause whereby men attaine vnto felicitie, to wit, the fauour of God, which he is onely able to giue to those that deserue it, and to withdraw it from those that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutiful (according as he requieth, and in such manner as I according to his direction, doe institute you) you shall neuer faile to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happines: and that which is more, those goods which you haue now obtained shall be perpetuall, and that which you want shall shortly be plentifully bestowed on you. Onely endeavour you your selves to be subiect to Gods will, and obedient to his commaundements: and neither propose vnto your selves any other lawes then those I haue giuen you, neither thorow contempt innouate any thing in your religion. Which if you shall performe, you shall excell all other Nations in warre, and grow inuincible against your enemies: for by Gods assistance all threats are easily contemned. Moreouer, there are great rewards (in all the court of life) proposed vnto vertue, and the her self to her selfe is a chiefe and especiall reward: besides, by her all other blessings are easily obtayned, which if you intertaine amongst your selves, you shall both lead a blessed life, & obtaine immortal glorie, not onely amongst strangers, but also in all posterities. These things are you to hope vpon, if neither you your selves violate those lawes (which by Gods commaund, and mine industrie) are set downe vnto you, neither suffer any other to violate the same, but in your selves continually meditate vpon the vnderstanding & vse thereof. As for my selfe, I depart this life in fulnes of ioy, reioycing at these your good fortunes, & commending you all to the lawes of pietie and prudence, & the vertue of your guides & magistrates, who hereafter are to take care of your safety and felicitie. God likewise, vnder whose conduct you haue liued (and to whose fauour you owe whatsoeuer profit you haue receiued by me) will not faile to take care of you, but as long as you shall honour both him and pietie, so long shall you remaine in securitie vnder his protection: neither shall you want such men, who shall giue you ghostly instructions, whose counsels if you obey, you shall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the high Priest, & Iesus, with the Senat and Magistrates of the tribes) towards whom beware least you grow stiffnecked, knowing and remembering this, that he that is instructed to obey well (when hee shall attaine vnto dignitie) will gouerne well. Neither suppose you that libertie consisteth herein, if you mutinie against the commaundments of your Princes: for hitherto haue you reposed your libertie in your contumacie towards your benefactors; from which sinne if hereafter you shall blesse your selves, you shall see your estate waxe still more flourishing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you should euer be so exasperated against these, as you haue beene sometimes incens'd against mee. For if you remember your selves, I haue beene more oftentimes in hazard of my life by your means, then by the enemy: Which I speake not therefore vnto you to vpbraid you therewith; for I would not leaue you afflicted with the remembrance hereof; at the houre of my death, (who euen at that time entertained the iniurie with a quiet minde) but to the ende that being by mee admonished, you should henceforwarde bee wiser in those things which hereafter shall concerne you; and least you should grow contumelious against your gouernours, being made proude with affluence of your riches, which you shall enioy at such time, as you haue ouerpassed Iordan, and conquered Chanaan. Otherwise if made more insolent by these blessings you fall into contumacie, and contempt of vertue, Gods fauour will neuer bee extended towards you; whom if by your sinnes you shall incense agaynst your selues, you shall both lose the lande which you haue conquered by your courage (by being shamefully oppressed by your enemies) and beeing dispersed ouer the face of the whole earth, you shall fill both the land and sea with your seruitude; which if it should come to passe, then were it too late to repent you, that you haue not obserued the lawes of your nation.

Wherefore (to the intent to auoid this danger, and for feare you violate the same) suffer not any of your enemies, after your victorie is once gotten, to lye; and think it more conduicible for your affaires, for feare least liuing with them, and intangled in the like studies & delights, you corrupt and depraue your Countrey lawes and institutions. Moreouer, I command you to destroy their woods, their altars, and temples, as many soeuer as you shall meete with, and so to rase them both with fire and flame, as there may not remaine any token or memorie of them any more. For so shall you more safely maintaine your estates. But least through ignorance of better things your nature be depraued by the worse, by Gods commandement I haue written you lawes, and a forme of administration, both of the common-weale, and your priuate estates; from which if you shall no wayes diuert, or wander, you shall prouee the most fortunate people of the earth.
When he had spoken these things, he deliuered them a booke, containing in writing their lawes, and customes of good life: which when they had heard and receiued, they melted in teares, and now lamented they both for the losse of their Captaine, as also for that they remembred them how many perils he had suffered, and how diligently he had procured their safetie and se-curitie: & they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recouer so good a Prince: & they suspected likewise that God would not hereafter be so fauourable vnto them, in that they had not a Moses to pray for them. Besides, they repented them of those things which (through furie) they committed against him in the desert, and were grievously sorie: so that all the people (breaking out into teares) would admit no consolation. But Moses recomforted them, and prayed them to giue ouer weeping, & encouraged them to receiue their lawes: and so for this time dissolved the assembly. But now before I addresse my self to manifest the rest, I haue thought it meete to insert in this place the lawes of this law-giuer, worthy both his maiestie and vertue: whereby the Reader may know what our lawes haue bene, euen from the first time, and institution of our common-weale. For all those things are extant which this man wrote, so that wee neede not faine or affixe any thing in way of ornament: wee haue onely renewed the order, and those lawes which he scatteringly set downe according as hee receiued them from God, wee haue generally digested into their places: whereof I thought good to admonish the Reader, for feare least hereafter anie of our Tribes comming to the view hereof, should rashly accuse me, for that I had not scarce faithfully deliuered the writings & institutions of Moses. Now will I re-con vp those lawes in especiall, which appertaine to the publike institution and rites of our Nation: but those things that concerne priuate customes and contracts, either betwixt our selues or forraigne nations, I haue deferred to be discoursed of in that commentarie, wherein (by Gods assistance) I intend to debate of our maners, and method in sacred causes.

After that you haue gotten the land of Chanaan, built your Cities, and haue begun in se-curitie to reape the fruit thereof; in obseruation of these commandements, you shall gratifie God highly, and establish your atchieued felicitie. Let there be one sacred citie in the region of Canaan, situate in a famous & fertile place, which God shall make choise of for himselfe, & his Prophets: In the same let there be one onely Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and unpolished stones, and such as are gathered here and there, which shall be conveniently placed and finished with decencie, as touching the outward ornament: and let not the ascent of the same be made by degrees, but let the earth bee easily and fildly raised. But in any other Citie let there be neither Altar, nor Temple: for God is one, and the Hebrew nation is one. Whosoever shall blaspheme God, let him bee stoned to death, and hanged for a day, and bee afterwards ignominiously and obscurely buried.

Let all the Hebrewes from their severall provinces, assemble themselves thrise in the year in the sacred Citie and Temple; that they may giue thanks vnto God for the benefites they haue receiued, and that they may by their prayers demerit his graces in future time; and that by their conuersation and mutuall intertainments, they may increase their beneuolence and loue the one towards the other. For it is behoouefull that they should know one another, who are of the same stocke, and are delighted in the same studies. And this verie fildly falleth out by their meetings after this kind of manner, whilest both the countenance and discourse as yet taketh deepe

A deepe roote in mens minds, as contrariwise, they that neuer meet, it behoueth them that be strangers the one vnto the other.

Besides, let the tenth part of the fruits (besides them that are due to the Priests and Leuites) which you are accustomed to sell in your markets (beeing reduced into readie money) bee spent on sacrifices and banquetts in the sacred Citie. For it is requisite to celebrate feasts in Gods honour, of the fruits of the earth, which we haue receiued from his hands.

Let no sacrifice bee made of the hire of an harlot: for neither doeth any thing delight God which is annexed with iniurie; neither is there greater viciannesse, then the shamefull and vnlawfull mixture of our bodies.

Likewise, if any man take reward for couering a bitch (whether she be for the chafe, or for the flocke) it is not lawfull to make sacrifice vnto God thereof. Let no man speake ill of those gods which other Countreys and Cities suppose to be gods. Let no man spolie any strange Temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a garment woven of linnen and woollen, for it belongeth onely to the Priests.

Euerie seventh year, when the people shall be assembled together in the sacred Citie to sacrifice vpon the feast of Tabernacles, at such time as the feast approacheth, the high Priest from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) shall read the law vnto all of them: so that neither women nor children shall be exempted from the hearing of the same, no nor the verie slaues and bondmen. For it is requisite that they haue the perpetuall memorie thereof, alwayes imprinted in their minds: for so shall they sinne the lesse, in that they vnderstand what is decreed in the law.

The lawes likewise shall be of more force in the consciences of those that shall offend, whilest they infixe in the minds of those that heare them, their doctrines intermingled with menaces: so that the wil to performe the law shall neuer be inwardly extinguished; & besides that the remembrance will liue in the, how many plagues they incur by contempt therof.
Let children in especiall learne the lawes, then which discipline there is not any more honest; neither more conduicible vnto felicitie. Twice in the day, in the morning & in the evening about bed time, let God be honoured for his benefite of our deliuerance out of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reasonable, to giue thanks vnto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we haue before time receiued, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of these also are to bee written ouer our doores, and worn on our armes: and those things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be borne about, written on the head and armes: that euerie way Gods bountie may be seene towards his people. In euerie Citie or township let there bee seven gouernours, such as are approued in vertue, and famous for their iustice: let each one of these magistrates haue two ministers of the tribe of Levi. Let those that are appointed Iudge in the Cities be held in high reputation: so that in their presence no man presume either to vrg contumelies, or iniurious speeches: for so shall it come to passe, that men accustomed to doe reuerence, shall also exercise themselves in pietie, and grow so much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatseuer seemeth good to the Iudges to decree, let that be held inuiolable; except it be apparant that they be corrupted with money, or that they may be manifestly conuicted of a wrongfull iudgement. They ought likewise to iudge without respect of lucre or dignitie, and pre-ferre iustice before all other things: for this iniurie sorteth out to Gods contumelie, as if it were to be supposed, that he is to be suspected to be weaker then they, for whose sake they wrest the law contrarie to equitie: for Gods power is iustice; he therefore that giueth iudgement in fauor and partialitie of great men, maketh them greater then God himselfe. And if the Iudges cannot determine of the matter in question (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them referre the cause to the sacred Citie, and then shall the high Priest and the Prophet, with the assistance of the Senate, determine that which shall be conuenient.

The testimonie of one witness shall not be receiued, but of three, or at leastwise of two, whose testimonie shall be made good by the examination of their behaviour and life. As for women, it is not lawfull for them to beare any witness, by reason of the leuitie and temeritie of that sexe.
Neither is it lawfull for a man seruant to bring in testimonie, by reason of his degenerate and ignoble mind: for is to be suspected, that either for lucre sake, or for feare, he will depose an vntrue testimonie. And if a false witness shall fortune to be beleued, and hereafterwards bee con-uicted of periuiric, let him be subiect to that penaltie, which he should haue endured that should haue bene cast by his false accusation. If manslaughter be committed in any place, and the offender may not be found out, neither there appeare any likelihood, that the man is slaine of malice, let there be a diligent and carefull inquisition made (with rewards prefixed to the disco-uerer)

Aristocracie
the best kind of gouernment.
Deut. 17.

The gouernment of the Peeres is the best kind of regiment of all other sorts of gouernments take you therefore heed that you desire no other forme of policie, but retaine and continue the same, hauing no other superiours but the lawes; and managing your affaires by your selues. For it sufficeth you that God is your Prince.

Of the election of a king.

Yet notwithstanding, if you shall grow in desire to haue a king, (see that yee elect one of your owne nation, that he in all things be studious to procure iustice, and all other vertues, perswading himselfe that God and the lawes are most vpright: Let him not vnderake any thing without the aduice of the high Priest, and the counsell of the elders. Let him not haue diuers wiues, neyther let him hunt after huge treasures, nor multitudes of horse: for feare least possessing them, he become so insolent, as that he raise his power and will aboute the lawes: and if you see him affected vnto these things, beware lest he grow more puissant then is expedient for you.

Deut. 19.
The bounds of lands are not to be remoued.

It is not lawfull for any man to remoue the land markes, neither of his owne land, or any other mans whatsoeuer; for by this meanes is the peace conserved: Let each one therefore beare to remouue them, because they are as the voyce of God, assured for euer. For warres and souldiers are raised thereby, when such as would augment their inheritance, striue alwayes to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: And they that are so hardie to remouue the same, are not farre from contempt of the lawes.

Leuit. 25.
The plants that are not of four years growth are prohibited.

He that shall plant a peece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth yeare, the first fruits thereof shall not be offered vnto God, neither shall any man eate thereof, by reason that the time is inconuenient, and permitteth not that the trees should fructifie as yet; and nature her selfe is as it were enforced before her time, whereby the fruit is neither conuenable for God, nor couenient for the vse of man. But all that fruit that shall grow in the fourth yeare (for then is the time that the trees should beare) shall be gathered and brought into the holy Citie (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they shall be eaten during the feast which the Lord therof maketh to his friends, and with Orphanes and Widowes: But in the fifth yeare it shall be lawfull for him to gather the fruit for himselfe.

Vines to be planted.
The law of the plough.

Sow not a field that is planted with vines, for it sufficeth that it nourisheth one sort of plants: so that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to be plowed with Oxen: neither are any other sorts of beasts to be yoked with them, but the tillage must alwayes be performed by beasts of the same kind.

The seeds also ought to be cleane and without any mixture; so that two or three sorts ought not to be sowed together: for nature alloweth not a commixtion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull also to couer the female with a male of another kind: for it is to be feared that this filthines should draw men to forget themselves; and grow in contempt of that sexe which is appropriate vnto them: for it often falleth out, that from small beginnings, things waxe worser and worser. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chaunce to grow any maime in policie: for which cause the lawes dissemble not (no nor the lightest) things, to the end they may no way seeme to be deficient in their nature.

They that mow and reape corne, ought not to glean, but to leaue some eares for those that are in necessitie, to the end to succour them. They likewise that plant vines, ought to leaue some clusters for the poore, and some fruit on the Oliue trees, to the intent that they that haue none of these, may gather some little thing for their reliefe: for the owners of the field shall not reape so much profit by the sparing inning of their corne, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poore shall reape by their gleanings: for God will bring to passe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but shall haue care of the nourishment of those that are in necessitie) shall be farre more fat and fertile to bring forth and nourish her fruit.

A Neither is the mouth of the Ox to be mouzled, at such time as he treadeth the corne in the mow: for it standeth not with reason, that they who haue beene partakers of the labour, and haue traualled for the increase of the fruites; should bee bridled from the vse and benefite thereof.

Neither ought the traualler also in his journey to be denied to gather and taste the fruites of Autumne; but he is to be permitted to take his fill, as if they were his owne, whether hee bee of the country or a stranger, who shall depart ioyfully, in that they haue beene made partakers of such fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carie any away with them.

They likewise that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taste of them as they beare them to the presse: for it is an vnjust thing, that the goods which are giuen by the will of God for the sustenance of man, should be denied them that desire to taste the fruit which God giueth in due season, and must sodainly passe away.

They likewise are to be invited, that through shame make nice to touch the same, yea and to be intreated to take part (if they be Israelites) for such are companions and maisters, in that they are of the same race; and if they trauell into any place, they ought to be intreated to take part of those benefites which God presented vnto them according to the season. For it is not to be supposed, that that is ill employed, which in way of curtesie a man permitteth another man to take, since it is God that furnisheth and giueth the abundance and foison of all things, not to the end to inioy them in priuate, but also to bestow them willingly; and he it is that by this means would declare vnto other people, the good will hee beareth to the people of Israel, and the felicitie whereof he maketh them partakers, by reason that in that abundance which they haue, his will is that other men should haue part thereof. But who soeuer shall do the contrarie, let him bee chastised for this his dishonestie, and in publike receiue thirtie nine stripes (if he be a free man) for that making himselfe a slave vnto his gaine, he hath dishonoured his excellent qualitie.

It shall verie well become you (said Moses) since you haue tasted miseries both in Egypt, and the desert; that you haue care of those who are in like estate; and for that you are made rich by Gods mercie and providence, it behooueth and becommeth you to impart somewhat to the indigent, who at the present are in that estate in which you were.

Besides the two tenths which I commanded you yearely to pay (the one to the Leuites, and the other for your festiuals) you shall for euery yeare annexe a third, to be distributed amongst the poore, to women, widowes, and orphanes.

Incontinently after a man hath gathered his first fruits, he shall bring them to the Temple: and after he hath giuen thanks vnto God (for that the land which he hath giuen him in possession hath brought forth fruit) and as soone as hee hath accomplished that sacrifice (which the law commandeth him to make) hee shall giue the first portion to the Priests. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do (as well the tenths vnto the Leuites, as also those other things which were ordained for the feasts, and first fruits) being readie to returne vnto his home, let him stand vpright neere vnto the Temple, and aboute all things giue thanks vnto God, that hauing deliuered them from the grievous seruitude of Egypt, he hath giuen them a plentiful and ample land to enioy: and making protestation that he hath paid the tenths according to Moses law, let him beseech God; that he will be fauourable both to himselfe in priuate, and the Hebrewes in publike; and that he will continue those goods vnto him which hitherto hee hath bestowed vpon him, and of his great goodnesse and mercie vouchsafe to encrease them.

Let those that are of full yeares to be married, match themselves with vertuous virgins; and such as are borne of honest parents. And he that will not take a virgin to wife, let him not abuse himselfe with one that is married to another man, lest he breed discontent and sorow in her first husband. Let not free men match themselves with such as are seruants, no nor although they bee thereunto moued by loue. For it is a thing worlthe and befitting honour, to surmount a mans affections. Let no man meddle with an Harlot (whose sacrifice God refuseth, by reason of the filthinesse of her bodie.) For the children shall bee of a free heart, and addressed in verrie, nor if of an harlot.

For the children shall bee of a free heart, and addressed in verrie, nor if of an harlot. they be ingendred in villanous and vnlawfull concupiscence; but if they be begotten and borne by a free father and mother. If any man take a virgin prisoner, or such a one as hath bene already married, and bee deforous to take her to his wife, it is not lawfull for him to touch or approach her before such time as she hath bene shauen, and (hauing put on her mourning apparell) hath bewailed her parents, or friends slain in battell: but after she hath in this sort asswaged her sorrow, she may afterwards addit herselfe to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honest and iust, that he that entertaineth her to haue issue by her, should condescend vnto her will in all that wherein he might gratifie her, and that he should not onely addit himselfe to the pursuit of his pleasure: when as then the thirtie daies of mourning shall be expired (for that time is sufficient for the wife to bewaile her friends in) then may she harken after marriage: and if after he hath had his pleasure with her, it fortune that he mislike her, and will not accept hir for his wife, he can no more make her his slave, but she may goe whether soeuer she please, for that she beareth with her her libertie.

That they had received them at Gods handes with great thanksgiving and infinite ioy, and brought them vp with great care and diligence, sparing nothing that might appertaine to their sustentance or instruction. Now therefore (that they say, surely the tollies of youth are to be pardoned) let this suffice you that hitherto you haue forgotten your dutie: for which cause, remember your selfe, and grow wise: thinking with your selfe that God is grievously offended against those who disobey or disdain their parents, by reason that he himselfe is the father of all mankind, whosometh to be preiudiced in himselfe, in that dishonour which is done vnto those that beare his name, at such time as they receiue not such dutie from their childrens hands, as he commaundeth. The law likewise inflicted an ineuitable punishment against such: which thou oughtest with all providence to preuent and not incur. If by these medicines the vnbridled irregard of youth may be healed, let no man either impute or reproche him in his submission: for in so doing, the law-maker shall be accounted mercifull, and the parents shall be held to be happy, when as they see that their sonne or daughter is exempt from punishment. But if such speeces and instructions of the father are set light by the sonne, let the lawes be irreconcilable enemies against such continuall outrages committed by the children against their parents, and let them drag them out of the Citie, in the sight and presence of all the people, and there let him be stoned to death: and after the offender hath lien there a whole day in the sight of the people, let him be interred and buried by night. Deut. 23

It is not lawfull for any Hebrew to lend vpon vsurie, whether it be meat or drinke: for it is an vnjust thing to make profit of the fortunes of the tribes; but it is better to succour their necessities; and impute their thanksgiving, and Gods retribution, to be a gaine vnto them, which are wont to follow such kind of benefites. But they that haue borrowed either money, or any fruit, either drie or moist; when as by the fauour and assistance of God, they shall reape their owne harvest, and gather their fruit, let them make a willing restitution to those that haue lent them, as if they had laid them vp for themselves, to possesse them at such time as they had need of them. But if there be any so impudent as they will not make satisfaction, let no man enter into their houses to take a pawne, before the Iudges haue giuen order that the pledge should be demanded before their doore, and the debtor without contradiction shall bring it vnto him, being assisted by the maiestie of the law. If he of whom the pledge is taken haue sufficient abilitie, the creditor may retaine the gage, till such time as he be paid: but if hee be poore, he shall restore him his pawne before the sunne set; and especially if it be any garment whereon he is accustomed to sleepe: for God doth naturally bestow his mercy on those that are poore. It is not lawfull to receiue in way of gage either a mill, or ought else that belongeth thereunto, least any debtor should be deprived of the necessarie instruments to prouide his victuals with, and hee should endure any euill thoroow povertie. Let him that committeth any theft be punished with death; but he that hath stolne either gold or silver, let him restore it two-fold. If any man kill such as breake into their houses to rob them, or they that breake their wallles, let not such a one be punished. Who so shall steale a beast shall restore foure for it; except it bee an Oxe, for which one shall suffice five-fold: and if the thief want meanes to pay this penaltie, let him be their slave against whom they haue trespassed, and at whose suit they are condemned. If any one be sold vnto one of his owne tribe, let him serue him seuen yeares; and at the seuen yeares end, hee shall depart with libertie: but if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer, he beget any child vpon a female fellow slave, and that hee bee willing to serue by reason of the good affection and great amitie that he beareth vnto the house, in the year of liberte (which happeneth every fiftieth yeare) let him be set at libertie, leading away with him his children, & wife with their freedom. If any man find money of gold by the way, let him seeke out him that hath lost it, and make knowne the place where he found it, to the intent he may restore it, knowing that the profit is not good, which cometh and accrueeth by an other mans iniurie. The like is to be done with beasts, for if any man find them strayed in the desert, if he find not out the owner, let him presently keepe it by him, taking God to witnesse that he will not detaine with him another mans goods. Let him that committeth any theft be punished with death; but he that hath stolne either gold or siluer, let him restore it two-fold. If any man kill such as breake into their houses to rob them; or they that breake their walles, let not such a one be punished. Whoso shall steale a beast shall restore foure for it; except it be an Oxe, for which one shall satisfie foure-fold: and if the thiefe want meanes to pay this penaltie, let him be their slave against whom they haue trespassed, and at whose suit they are condemned. If any one be sold vnto one of his owne tribe, let him serue him seven yeares; and at the seven yeares end, hee shall depart with libertie: but if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer, he beget any child vpon a female fellow slave, and that hee bee willing to serue by reason of the good affection and great amitie that he beareth vnto the house, in the year of Iubile (which happeneth every fiftieth year) let him be set at libertie, leading away with him his children, & wife with their freedom. If any man find money or gold by the way, let him seeke out him that hath lost it, and make knowne the place where he found it, to the intent he may restore it, knowing that the profit is not good, which commeth and accruech by another mans iniurie. The like is to be done with beasts, for if any man find them strayed in the desert, if he find not out the owner, let him presently keepe it by him, taking God to witnesse that he will not detaine with him another mans goods. travailed with foule weather, let him indeuour himselfe to saue the same, and helpe him that is the owner, not sparing or making nice of any labour.

Let each man direct the ignorant trauailer in his way, and set him in the right path if he wander, without deluding him, or hindering him in his necessities, or misleading him in his iourney.
Let no man speake ill of him that is either ablent or deafe. If any man bee strooken in a quarrell, and it be not with a weapon, let him that strooke him bee presently punished in receiuing the like outrage as he hath offered him. But if he be carried into his house, and lie sicke vpon it diuerse dayes, and in the end die thereof, he shall be exempt of the penaltie. But if he escapeth, and during the time of his sicknesse hath bene greatly hindered and charged; then let him that strooke him pay all the charges he hath bene at during the time he kept his bed, and satisfie the Philiti- H ons. He that with his foote shall strike a woman with child, if the woman miscarie, he shall bee by the Iudges amerced in a summe of mony, for that he hath lessened the number of the people by the losse of him that is dead in his mothers wombe. Let him likewise bee condemned to pay a summe of money vnto the husband. But if the woman die of the stroke, hee that offred the violence must die the death also, by reason that the law iustly ordaineth, that life should bee satisfied with life.

Let not any one among the Israelites, vse any mortall poyson, nor any drug that may do hurt vnto any man: and if any man be found with such things about him, let him die, dying that death which he determined they should suffer, for who he had prepared the poyson. VVho hath maimed any man, or puld out his eye, let him in like manner be maimed and blinded, being deprived of the same member of his bodie whereof hee hath deprived another man; except hee that is maimed had rather haue a pecuniarie amends, by reason that the law remitteth it to the election of the offender to estimate his iniurie, and if hee will bee more seuerer he may. If any one haue an Oxe that striketh with his horne, let him kill him: and if the same Oxe striketh and killeth any man in the field, or mow, let him bee stoned to death, and let no man eate the flesh thereof. And if it be prooued that the maister which oweth the same hath heretofore knowne the qualitie of the beast, and hath not taken order hee should do no harme, let him also be put to death, as being the author of the murder committed by the Oxe. But if the said Oxe kill a slaue, either male or female, he shall be stoned; and the owner thereof shall pay thirtie sicles to the maister of the slaue that is slaine. If one Oxe be strooken by another, so as he die thereof, let both of them (both that which was dead, and that which stroke the other to death) be sold, and the price thereof shall be departed equally betwixt both their owners. They that dig a pit or cisterne, must bee careful that they inclose and fence it in with planks or bars, not to hinder any man from drawing water, but least any man by misfortune should fall into the same. And if any mans beast shall fall into the same (and it vndefenced) the owner of the pit must pay to the owner of the beast the price thereof: and euer after let it bee couered as it were with a wall; for feare least any thereafter fall into the same. Let him that receiueth any thing in trust keepe it carefully, as a thing sacred and diuine; and let neither man nor woman attempt to alien that which is committed to his custody, although thereby he might gaine an infinite sum of gold; and although there were not any man that could conuince him thereof. For since that generally the conscience knoweth the same, euery one ought to endeouour himselfe to deale vprightly; & supposing himselfe to be a sufficient witness against himselfe, let him doe those things which are laudable in the sight of men, but in especiall that which is pleasing to God, from whose sight no wrongfull dealing is concealed: if notwithstanding he to whom this trust is committed (without any fraud on his part) shall chance to lose the thing that is so left in trust; let him present himself before seuen Iudges, and there take another that nothing is lost by his wil or weeting; & that he hath not conuerted any part thereof to his own vse, whereupon let him be dismissed without any further enquire. But if he haue made vse of the least part of that which hath bene committed to his charge & trust, and that he happen to lose it, he shall be condemned to restore all that which was committed to his keeping. As it hath bene ordained in respect of matters in trust: the like is decreed as touching hire which is due vnto the labourer; and let each man take heed least hee defraud a poore man of his hire, knowing that God gaue him his hands instead of lands, and other possessions. For which cause the payment of hire ought not to be deferred, but satisfied the same day, by reason that God permitteth not that the labourer should lose the fruit of his trauell. The children shall not bee punished, for the misdeeds of their parents: but if they be vertuous, and are begotten by lewde fathers, they rather merit that men should haue compassion of them, then that they should hate them: neither are the

OF THE IEWESE IN THE III. BOOKE.

A the offences of the children to be imputed to the parents, by reason that youth oftentimes en-geth in those follies, which he neither learned by examples, nor for which hee endureth not to be reprouid. Eunuches are to be detested, and their companies to be fled, because they depriae the pleasures of manhood, and the gift of begetting children, which God hath giuen vnto men for the increase of mankind. Such people therefore are to be driuen farre from vs, and esteemed wholly inexcusable, who kill their children before they be borne. For it is a matter very manifest, that their spirits being effeminate, their bodies also are degenerate. Each thing also that is monstrous to behold, is to be driuen away: neither is it lawful to geld either men or beasts.
Let this be the disposition of those lawes, wherewith you shall be pollicied and gouerned in time of peace, and God be fauourable vnto you, and giue you grace to vse them in good order, and without confusion. And since it cannot otherwise be, but that humane affaires must sometimes fall into troubles and dangers, somwhiles beyond desire & expectation, and otherwhiles of set par-pose: I will briefly set you downe certaine lawes as touching that point, to the intent that being fore-instructed of that which you ought to do, you may haue abundance of holisom remedies, and being well provided and instructed in that which you ought to do, you may preuent and not fall into any danger and calamitie.

God grant that you may enioy the countrey. (which he hath giuen you) in contempt of tra-uels and in exercise of vertues; and that you may possesse the same in security and peace, and that strangers may not leuie armies to ouerthrow you, and that no ciuil mutiny may be raysed amongst you, which may bring to passe, that that which hath bene well ordered and decreed by C your aunccestors, doe come to nought, when you shall happen to commit the contrarie. Liue therefore, and persist you to conforme your selues to those lawes, which both God hath approued for good, and hath also giuen you. But if perhaps your selues at this present, or your succes-sours hereafter, shall fortune to entertaine and vndertake a warre, God grant it may happen without the confines of your countrey: but if the matter must needs be tried out by the sword, you shall send certaine heralds to your destinated enemies. For before you enter battell, it shall bee requisite first of all to parlee with them, and to declare vnto them that you haue a great army, and horses, and weapons, and (besides all these) that you haue Gods fauour and assistance: who shall require them therefore that you may not be enforced to warre against them, nor to make bootie of their goods, and to carry them away in spight of their resist. If they condescend vnto D any reasonable conditions, then entertaine peace; making your accompt that they are stronger then you be: but if they will needs offer you iniury, you shall lead forth your army against them, hauing God for your Generall and soveraigne Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your selues haue chosen; surpassing all the rest in valour. For wher as there are diuers commanders, it falleth out that that which ought necessarily and readily to be executed, is hindered; and commonly the issue is vnfortunate, where there are diuers commanders. Let your army be generally leuied of men that are strong in body, and hardy in courage, and sequester from your armie him that is fearefull, least such men hapning to flie when they ought to fight, do giue your enemies the aduantage. Let them also be free from war, who hauing built them a new house, haue not enioyed the same for a yeares space; as also he, that hath planted a vineyard and hath not gathered the fruite thereof; and besides these, hee that hath wedded a wife; and hath not as yet E brought her home to his house: least being transported with the desire of these things, and reserving themselves to their forsaken pleasures, in the behalfe of their wiues, they fight but faintly and coldly.

But when you haue brought your army into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you shall assault any Cities, if you fortune to haue any neede of matter to make engins of, grub not the land, neither see you cut downe the fruitfull trees, but spare them; remembering you that they are planted for the good of men, and that if they could speak they would accuse you, alleging that without cause of war they are ill intreated against all right: and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would dislodge and remoue into another country.

F But when the battell is ended, and the day is yours, kill all those enemies that resisted you in the skirmish, the rest reserve as your tributaries (except the people of the land of Chanaan, for they with all their families are to be ruined.) Beware also (but especially in warre) that neither a woman vse a mans apparell, neither a man a womans raiment. These are the lawes which Moses left. He gaue them likewise certaine institutions (which he had written forty yeares before that time) whereof we will speak in another treatise. Some few dayes after (for he assembled the people six daies one after the other) he gaue them his blessing, and pronounced his maledictions against those which should not live according to his lawes, but should transgresse the determinations thereof: He read also vnto them a Poeme of sixe measures (which hee had enregistred in the holy booke) containyng a prediction of things to come, according to which all things haue and doe fall out, without varying any waies from the truth and verity. These volumes and the Ark, gaue he vnto the Priests; in which he also placed the ten commaundements written in the two tables. Hee committed also vnto them the custodie of the Tabernacle. He likewise exhorted the people that (at such time as by force they had conquered the promised countrey, and were planted therein) they should not forget the iniurie which the Amalechites had done vnto them, but that they should lead forth their army against them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done then, at such time, as they were in the desert. And commanded them that as soon as they had taken the countrey of Chanaan, they should exterminate and extinguish all the people.

He willed them also to erect an Altar toward the rising of the sunne (not farre from the Cite of Sichem, betweene two mountaines, the one Garizim on the right hand; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that distributing the people into two parts (sixe tribes in every part) they should plant them on the mountaines. And he commaunded that the Leuites, and Priests should be with them, to the intent that they first of all that were vpon the mountaine of Garizim, should beseech God that hee would multiply his blessings vpon them that should bee zealous of his seruice, and carefull of the conseruation of his lawes, without diuerting from that which Moses had commaunded. The sixe other also were appointed to answer the like: and when as likewise these six last had praied, the sixe first were to answer them, and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions against the transgressors (each one answering other) in ratification of that which had been spoken. He reduced also vnder writing these blessings and curses, to the intent that the memorie thereof might neuer bee suppressed or extinguished by time: which he also (being neere vnto his death) caused to be written in the Altar on the one side thereof, in that part which extended it selfe toward the place where the people stood, at such time as they sacrificed and offered burnt offerings. Since which day there were no more sacrifices offered in that place: because it was contrary to law. Thus did Moses establish, and these the Hebrew nation obserue continually & inuolably, euen vnto this day.

On the next morrow, he reasssembled all the people, themselves, their wiues, and children: he likewise commaunded that the slaues should be there present, binding them by an oath that they should maintain and keepe the lawes, and that diligently tying themselves to the wil of God, they should not so much esteeme either their kinned, or means, or perils, or any other cause whatsoever, as that thereby they should be driuen to neglect their lawes, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether it were any one of their kinned, or any City whatsoever, that would seeke to alter and disturbe the same, or strue to weaken the estate thereof, that both in particular and in publike, they should expose themselves and endeavour to punish them: and if they should fortune to take such a City, that they should rase and vtterly deface the same; and if it were possible not to leaue one stone vpon another, but to destroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take such a reuengc, yet that they should make it knownen that they were not consenting to their impietie. Hereunto the whole people subscribed and sealed it with an oath. He afterwards tolde them, how the people should know when the sacrifices were agreeable vnto God, and how they ought to march out to battell, taking a signe of the stones of which I haue forespoken.

Iosuah likewise, during the life and in the presence of Moses, foreprophecied whatsoever he intended to performe for the profit of the people, either abroad in the administration of war, or at home in prescribing lawes; and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly prescribed them) he tolde them, that by instructions from God he foreprophecied, that if they violated their countrey religion, they should not escape their destruction; for that both their country should be filled with forraigne armes, and their Cities sackt, and their temple burnt, & that they themselves should be tolde vnder the speare, and that they should serue a nation which would not be moued or touched with consideration of their afflictions and miseries; and that at length they should roolately and vnprofitably repent them of their error: yet that God their establisher should restore Cities to the Citizens, and a Temple to his people: And that it should come to passe, that they should not lose this only one time, but also very many times. Then did Moses also exhort Iosuah that he should lead his army against the Chanaanites, promising him that God would be assistant in his actions, prophceying besides much good hap vnto the people.

Since

A Since that (saith he) I goe vnto mine ancestors, and that God hath prefixed this day and time of my departure, I protest before you, that liuing as yet and standing in your presence, I giue him thanks for the care and providence, which he hath hitherto had of your affaires, nor onely in propulling your aduerfaries, but also in largely imparting his blessings vnto you, and for that he hath alwaies fauourably helped me whilst I endeouored by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better state: And that which is more, it is he which hath giuen both the entrance & the issue; making vse of me but as his committee and seruant in all that good, which hee would should be done vnto his people. For all which things I haue thought it requisite, that (in departing from you) I should blesse the power of God, who in time to come shall haue the care and charge of you: and to acquit my selfe of that debt, I leaue you this in remembrance, which is, that you ought to serue and honour him, and reuerence the ordinances which he hath giuen you, whereby (continuing his fauours towards you) he will graunt you grace to conserue and keepe this excellent gift. Truly that law-maker (that were no more then a man) would be greatly displeased and highly discontented with those men, who should violate his ordinances, and should set them at noughts: doe not you therefore tempt God, who is prouoked vnto anger, when those lawes which he himselfe hath established and giuen you, shall be contemned and neglected.

Whilst Moses pronounced these his last words, and discoursed vnto the tribes their severall destinies, the whole multitude brake into teares; and the women beating their breasts, shewed and exprest the sorrow they had conceiued at his death. The children likewise lamented, making it knownen that they could not bee masters of their owne sorrowe, because that in their tender yeares they had vnderstood the vertue and famous actes of Moses; and betwixt the elder and younger sort, there was as it were a conflict who should weepe more bitterly: for the one vnderstanding of how worthy a Gouvernour they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, because they should then forsake him; before they had sufficiently tasted and made triall how great his vertue was. But how great the compassion and complaint of the people was, a man may make coniecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For, although he were assuredly perswaded, that a man was not to lament vpon the instant of his death (in that it chanced vnto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and restraine himselfe from teares: And whilst he was born thither where he vanished out of their sight, all of them followed him, wetting their faces and bosomes with flowing teares. Then did Moses (beckening with his hand) warne them from afar off, that they should stand stil and keep their places, and exhorted them that were nearest him, by word of mouth, that they should not follow nor prosecute him any further with teares, for feare least they should make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth, and Eleazar the high Priest, and the chieftaine Iesui. And when he was arrived vpon the mountaine called Abarim (which is very hie, and situate neere vnto Iericho, and from whence he might discouer the greater part of the land of Chanaan) he dismissed the elders: and whilst with mutuall embraces he rooke his last leaue of Eleazar and Iesui, and discoursed with them, a cloud sodainly enuironed him, and he was taken away into a certaine valley: but in the scripture he writeth that he died, fearing least for the excellency of his vertue, they might report that he was rauished and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundred and twenty yeares, the third part whereof he spent in gouernment (one month only exempted.) He died the last month of the yeare, and the first day of that month which the Macedonians call Dystus, and our countrymen Adar. Of all men the wisest that euer was, and who in execution of his good counsells had no man to equall him. Moreouer in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertaine and perswade the people, he had no second: and so were his affections alwaies leuelled and limited by his wisdom, that hee seemed vtterly to want them; and that only he knew the names of those passions which hee perceived to be too active in other men. In his gouernment he was matchlesse, in his prophecies peerlesse, so that all the orations that he made seemed to be Oracles. For which cause the whole multitude mourned for him during the terme of thirty daies: neither were the Hebrewes euer seised with so extreme griefe, as they were at that time when the Prophet died; neither did he only leaue behind him a present desire of him, but a great estimation amongst all men, who haue euer chanced to read and examine his writings, whilst by them they make estimate of his vertues. And these are those things which I thought good to bespoken of the death of Moses.

Iesus sendeth spies into Iericho

Iesus calleth to memory & reckoneth vp what the tribes of Gad, Ruben, & Manasses had promised Moses. Num. 13. The spies suruey Iericho.

After that Moses had bin taken from amongst men (after the manner as I haue declared) and that all whatsoeuer he had ordained, was duly performed, and his funerall obsequies were at an end: Iesus commanded the people to prepare themselves, and to march forward into battell. He sent spies likewise into Iericho, who might both sound their minds, and discover their forces: presently after he dislodged, and incamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to passe the riuer of Iordan, as soone as any opportunity offered it selfe. Then assembled he together the Princes of the tribes of Ruben & Gad, and the halfe tribe of Manasses (for to this halfe tribe the countrey of the Amorites was giuen for an habitation, which was the seuenth part of Chanaan) and remembered them of that which they had promised vnto Moses, entreating them (in memory and fauour of him, who in the last period of his life was not wearied to take care of their common-weale, and publike profit) speedily and willingly to performe that which they had promised vnto him: who shewing themselves ready and willing, to performe that which hee commaunded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thousand men, that were his followers, and afterwards (departing from the City of Abila) he drew towards Iordan, and marched forward some sixty furlongs. As soone as he was encamped, the spies returned againe and presented themselves vnto him, certifying him of the whole estate of the Chanaanites. For being vnknownen and vsuspected, vpon their first arriuall they obserued and viewed the walls end strength of the City at their pleasure, searching which of them were more or lesse defended, and which of the gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of those that met them, offer any offence vnto them: whilst they thus pried into, & viewed euery place

A place, the Citizens interpreted their diligence to bee rather an accustomed curiosity of strangers, then suspected them that they intended any hostile stratageme.

About the shutting in of the euening, they rettyred themselves into a certaine hostrie that adioyned the walles, into which they had been directed to take their repast; and whilst after supper time they consulted vpon their returne, the king was giuen to vnderstand (as he late at his supper) that certaine Spies sent out of the Hebrewes campe, had suruayed the Citie, and taken vp their lodging in Rahabs house, where they supposed to concale themselves till they might giue them opportunitie to depart. Whereupon the King sent a speedy commandement and officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, hee might by torture extort from them the cause and reason why they came into his Citie. Of whose approach, when

Rahab had gotten some priuate intelligence, she hid the Spies vnder certaine packes of linnen, which she dyed nere vnto the walls, and tolde them that were sent by the King, that certaine strange guests a little before Sunne set had sup in her house, but that they were departed; who if they were suspected by the King, as such as intended any detriment to the common-weale, they might with little labour and pursuit be easily surprised in their way. They hearing the woman speak after this manner, and imagining no subtilty or deceit in her, returned backe againe without searching the hostrie. But after they were busied and trauelled in the pursuit and search after them euery way, and trafficking of euery path, whereby they might be suspected to trauell towards Iordan, and perceiuing no signe of their flight, they desisted any further to pursue them. No sooner was the tumult appeased, but Rahab calleth forth the Spies, and tolde them the dangers to which she had exposed her selfe for their security sake (for had she bin conuincied to haue concealed them, she might by no means haue escaped the punishment of the King, but that both she and all her family had miserably perished.) She therefore required them, that at such time as they should bee Lords of the countrey of Chanaan, and had both the occasion and power to require her curtesies, that they would haue her in remembrance. This sayde, shee dismissed them (to the end they might returne home againe.) But before their departure she took an oath of them, to warrantize both her selfe and all that which appertained vnto her, at such time as they should become masters of the Citie, and had destroyed all the Citizens thereof, according to the arrest and sentence giuen against them; which she knew should come to passe, hauing certaine apprehension of the same, by certaine signes and tokens from God: whereupon for the present with many thanksgiuings they protested, and for the future avowed and swore vnto her, to acknowledge her kindnesse not in words, but in deedes. At such time therefore as she should perceiue that the Citie was ready to be surprised, they counselled her that shee should rettyre all her substance, and all those that appertained vnto her, into her house; and that before the doore thereof, she should spread some crimson garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiuing the same, might inhibite the souldiours from pillaging and spoiling her house: For (said they) wee will giue him notice herof, by reason of that willing forwardnes that hath bin in thee to saue our liues) and if by misfortune anie of thy friends die in the combate, doe not impute the fault vnto vs; and wee beseech God (by whome we haue sworne) that he be not displeased against any of vs;

except against such as falsifie their oathes. Hauing after this manner accorded vpon the covenant, they let downe one another from the wall; and when they were arriued in safety among their nation, they recounted vnto them all that which had happened since their arriuall in the Citie. Iosuah hereupon declared vnto Eleazar the high Priest and the rest of the Elders, what his Spies had sworne vnto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promise they had made. But the Generall was penfoule and sore troubled, for that he knewe not which way he might passe the riuer of Iordan, by reason that for the present it was very deepe and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon; and if they would haue built one, the enemy would haue interrupted them: and further besides that, there were not anie places conuenient to stay in. But God made him a promise that he would make the waters fall; and giue them passage therethrough. Iosuah therefore encamped his hoste for the terme of two dayes (to the end he might passe ouer his whole Armie, and the rest of the people, after this manner following.) The Priests marched before with the Arke. After them went the Leuites bearing the Tabernacle, and those vessels which were destinated for sacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, distinguished in their Tribes; hauing inclosed within their battells the women and children, whereby they might be the more secure from the force of the flood. But when as the Priests had marched foremost, and found the riuer passable, and that the water was decreased, and that the current thereof was not so violent, neither the billowes so incensed; but that in the bottom there was good footing (for that the grauell and sand was not quicke but settled) then G all of them without feare passed ouer the foord, finding althings assuredly performed vnto them, which God had foreprophefied, and promised vnto them: but the Priests kept them in the midt of the channell vntill the multitude were past ouer, and were in securitie; and when as e uery one had gotten the other banke, the Priests issued out, permitting the riuer to flow ac- cording to his free and ordinary course: which pleasantly flowing grew to that greatnesse and swif- nesse which it retained at the first. Now when the Hebrewes had marched fiftie furlongs, they incamped themselues some tenne furlongs from Iericho. But Iesus builded an altar of stones (vvhich euery one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Iordan, ac- cording as the Prophet had commaunded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigi- ous restraintment of the flood, and on the same he sacrificed vnto God, and the solemnity of the Paſchal was celebrated in that place; and at that time they, who in times past were in great neces- sitie, were largely furnished with all plentie and abundance: for they did reape the corne of the Chanaanites (which at that time was ripe) and caried away the rest for a prey. In the same season likewise their nourishment of Manna failed them, wheron they had fed for the space of 40. yeers. And whereas the Israelites did all these things with security and freely, and the Chanaanites ne- uer failed out against them, but appauled with feare, shut themselues vp within their wals; Iesus decreed and resolved to besiege them in their Cities: so that on the first day of the feast, the Priests bearing the Arke, and guarded on euery side with troups of armed men drew neere vnto the Ci- tie, founding their Ieuén hornes: and exhorting their souldiers to behaue themselues manfully, they walked about and inuironed the walls round about, being attended both by the Senate and Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their hornes, and so returned backe into their campe. Which when they had done for the space of sixe dayes, on the seauenth Iofuah assembled the armie and all the people, bringing them ioyfull newes of the City, which that day should bee surprised without labour (the walls falling downe of their owne accord, and without mans hand, and yeelding them free passage and entrance into the City) and hee encouraged them to kill all those whom they met withall, and not to giue ouer the slaughter of their enemies, although they were wearie, neither to be moued with compassion, nor allured from the slaughter and execu- tion by desire of prey, or to permit the enemy in any sort to flie, but that they should extinguiſh and roote out all that which breathed and had life, reseruing nothing for prey or priuate profite. He commaunded likewise that all that which was found (either of golde or siluer) should bee brought into one place, & referred to be the first fruits of the happy works of God; and after the surprisall first of the Citie, that onely Rahab with her kindred should be sined, by reason of the othes which the spies had sworn vnto her. This said, he arranged his host, & made them approche the City, then did they once more walke round about the City, the Arke marching before them, and encouraging the army to valour by the sound of their Corners. And after they had enui- roned the walls seuen times, and had a little reposed themselues, the walles fell (wheras then neither the Hebrewes had enforced any engine against them, or used any other violence.) So that they entering into the City slue all those that were therein, who were already discomfited by the so- daine and vnexpected ouerthrow of their walles, and thorow their sodaine feare made vnapt to fight, so that they were slaine amidst their streets, finding neither refuge nor reliefe to succour them: yea so were they fished in the slaughter, that they neither spared women nor children, but filled the City with dead carcases, which at length being set on fire, serued them for a funerall flame to consume them in, and with equall furie rauaged and burnt the fields. Only Rahab and hir household (who kept themselues within her hostrie) were sined by the spies: who brought to Iofuahs presence, he gaue her thanks for sauing his spies, and promised her that hee would rewarde her courtesies, and anone after gaue her possessions, and euer after held her in great honour. All that of the City which the fire spared, the sword consumed. And Iofuah pronounced curses against those, who should afterward endeouour to erect that which he had ruinated: namely that he that should lay the first foundation, should be deprived of his first begotten sonne, and he that should finish the worke might lose his youngest sonne; neither pleased it God that this impreca- tion of his should be frustrate, as hereafter it shall be spoken. At the surprisall and sacke of this ci- tie, there was gathered an infinite quantitie of gold, siluer, and brasse, so that no man brake the Edict, or sought any prey or lucre thereby for himselfe. These spoiles Iesus deliuered vnto the Priests, to be laid vp in the treasure, and after this manner was the Citie of Iericho destroyed. But Achar the sonne of Zebed of the tribe of Iuda, hauing gotten a royall pall altogether embrode- red with golde, with an ingot of gold of three hundredth sicles in weight, and thinking in himselfe

A that it were a very fond thing, that the profite he had made by the hazard of his life, should bee ta- ken from him and presented vnto God, who had no neede thereof, digged a deepe pit in his tent, and buried his spoiles therein, thinking by this meanes to defraud God, and deceiue his compa- nions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal (which signifieth Enfranchized, because that hauing past the riuer Iordan they knew that they should be deliuered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penurie of the desert.) But some few daies after the destru- ction of Iericho) Iofuah sent out three thousand armed men against Ainan (a Citie situate a little about Iericho) who encountering with the Ainities in battell & by them put to flight, lost thirtie and sixe of their company. The newes of which disaster beeing brought into the campe, the I- raelites were seised with exceeding grieve, not onely for the men they had lost (which were all the Ainities) but also by reason of the despaire they conceived of their future successe. For being already perswaded that they were masters of the field, & that their armie should be alwaies warranted and safe at such time as they should fight (according as before times God had promised them) they saw (contrary to their opinion) that their aduerſaries had taken heart; inſomuch as clothing themselues in sackcloth vpon their raiments, they spent all the day in teares & lamentations without tasting any meat; so grieuouſly were they afflicted with the inconuenient that had hapned. But Iofuah perceiuing the armie discomfited after this manner, and conceiuing some sinister hope of their estates, boldly addressed himselfe vnto God saying: We haue not beene induced by our own temerity to attempt the conquest of this land by force, but we haue beene hereunto encouraged by thy seruant Moses, to whom thou hast promised by diuers signes that thou wouldst giue vs this country to inhabit in, & that our army should haue alwaies the vpper hand in battell, and of these thy promises we haue oftentimes experimented the euent. But now beyond all expectation (hauing receiued an ouerthrow and lost some of our foldiers) being terrified by this accident, and suspicious of thy promises to Moses, we both abstain from warre, and (after so many enterprises and entrances of warre) we cannot hope of any fortu- nat or successful proceedings. Be thou therefore assisstant vnto vs, O Lord (for it lieth in thy power) & by thy mercy relieue our present sorrow with a largesse of victory, & take from vs the thought of despaire wherein wee are too farr plunged. Iofuah lying prostrate on his face made this prai- er vnto God, who presently answered him, that he should arise, commanding him to purge the armie of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude who was so hardy as to violate and conceale those things which were consecrated vnto him, assuring him that that cause was the meanes of the present calamitie: but that as soone as he had searched out, and punished the sacrilege, the Israelites should become fortunate and obtaine the victorie. This Oracle Iofuah declared vnto the people, and calling for the high Priest and the Magistrates, he cast lots vpon the tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Iuda, it was againe cast by kinreds; and when againe the sacrilege was found to bee committed in Zacharias kinred, they examined the same once more man by man, and found out Achar: who ha- uing no meanes to deny the same, and being discovered by God himselfe, confessed the fact, and brought forth those things, which hee had concealed: Whereupon being presently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deserved it. But Iofuah ha- uing purified the people, ledde them forth against Ainan, and laying an Ambuscado by night time about the Citie, early in the morning hee drew the enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being encouraged by their former victorie) but Iofuah making a shew of retreat, drew them farther off from their Citie (forming in them an imaginarie hope that the Israelites fled, and that they should gaine a second victorie ouer them.) But when Iofuah sodainly made a stand, and fresh- ly charged them, and gaue a signall vnto those that lay in ambush, they were incontinently ad- dressed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entred the gates of the Citie, on the walles whereof there stood diuers of the inhabitants, beeing eye-witnesſes (as they thought) of their achieued victorie. In this manner was the Citie taken, and all they that were therein, were slaine: and Iofuah on the other side enforced those in such manner (with whom he maintai- ned skirmish) that they turned their backs, and fled towards the Citie, as if it had beene in the same estate as they left it; but when they perceiued that it was surprised, and saw both it, their wiues, and children consumed with fire, they scattered themselues about the fields, not being able to rallie themselues, by reason of their disturbance and disorder. After this ouerthrow of the Ainities, there were a great number of women, children, and bondslaves taken captiue, and store of all sorts of moueables. The Hebrewes also became Lords of much cattell, and gathe- red a great quantitie of siluer (for the countrey was rich.) All which Iofuah (vpon his returne to

Galgai distributed amongst the soldiers. But the Gabeonites (who dwelt not farre off from Ierusalem) vnderstanding what had hapned to them of Hiericho (and seeing the estate of the Ainites, and fearing lest the like misfortune might fall vpon them) thought it not good to offer treaties of peace to Iosuah, supposing they should find no tolerable conditions at his hands, because they knew that he warred vnder that resolution, vnto to roote out and extinguish the nation of the Chanaanites from off the earth. They therefore made a league with the Cephtherites, and Cathierimites their neighbours, telling them that they should not escape the danger if so be it fell out that the Gabeonites were first taken by the Israelites: but that if they were vnited together, they might both resist the greatness, and auoid the dangers of them. Which counsell of theirs being accepted, they sent embassadours vnto Iosuah (such men as they thought to be both most capable and wisest amongst them in the affaires of common-weale) to the intent to entreate a peace betwixt them and the Israelites: who knowing that it would be verie dangerous for them, if they should say that they were Chanaanites; & that on the contrarie side, they should auoid the danger, if they protested that they had no communic or alliance with them, but that they dwelled far off from them; told Iosuah, that (being incited by his fame) they had vndertaken a long journey, the truth whereof hee might coniecture by their habits: for vpon their letting forth their garments were new, and now by their long journey quite worne (for they had purposely put vpon them old raiment, to the end it might be suitable to their subtil insinuation.) Standing vp therefore in the midst of the multitude (attired after this maner) they told them that they were sent by the Gabeonites, and the neighbouring Cities thereabouts (farre disioyned from that country) to articulate and ratifie a peace betwene them, according as they haue bin accustomed to proceed in their accords: For knowing well that the countrey of Canaan was giuen vnto them by the grace and gratuite of God (so the end they should bee masters and possessors thereof) they were much reioiced thereat, and required them to be receiued as their confederates. By these words, and tokens of their garments, and intimation of their long journey, they perswaded the Hebrewes to enter an accord and amitie with them. And the high Priest Elezar with the counsell of the Elders sware vnto them, that they should be reputed for friends and allies, and that no vniust action should bee enterprised against them; the people likewise approued their oathes. But Iosuah encamping with his Armie vpon their confines, and vnderstanding that the Gabeonites dwelt not farre off from Ierusalem, and that they likewise were of the race of the Chanaanites, he sent for the principall and princes among them, and complained & vpbraided them of their deceit: whereunto they answered, that they had no other meanes to procure their safetie and securitie, and for that cause (and their necessitie sake) that they had sought their refuge thereby. Whereupon hee called vnto him Elezar the high Priest and the counsell of the Elders, who told him that he might not infringe the oath which they had made vnto them, but that he might depute them to serue the publike ministeries. Whereupon they were adiudged to attend on these seruices: and by this meanes deliuered they themselves from their imminent perill. But for that the king of Ierusalem was sore incensed against the Gabeonites (for that they had revolted, and submitted to Iesus) he assembled together the kings of his neighbour nations, to make warre against them. The Gabeonites perceiuing the danger they were in, and how the enemy was prepared to assault them (and how to that intent they had pitched their tents neere vnto a certaine fountaine not farre off from the Citie) they required Iesus to assise and defend them. For their affaires were in that estate, that they expected death from the hands of their friends; & contrariwise hoped for helpe to be warranted by those Hebrewes, with whom they had contracted amity (notwithstanding that they arrived in that country to destroy the whole nation of the Cananites) Iosuah therefore (hastning onward with his whole armie to giue them assistance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the enemy (at such time as he intended his assault) and hauing put them to flight, he pursued them by a steep tract, which place is called Bethora, where hee knew that God had fought for him (as it appeared manifestly by the thunder, lightning and haile that fell at that time, far bigger then was accustomed.) The day likewise (the like whereof was neuer heard of before) was lengthened; least by the speedy approche of the night the enemy should escape from the victor: whereupon it came to passe that Iesus tooke all those five Kings in a certaine caue neere Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to the death. And that the day at that time encreased above common custome it is extant & registred in the sacred volumes, which are referred in the Temple. When after this manner the Kings that invaded the Gabeonites were slaine and conquered, Iesus led his Armie into the mountaines of Canaan, where hauing made a great slaughter

ter of men, and taken a rich bootie, he brought backe his armie into Galgai. Now when the renoune of the Hebrewes valiant acts, and the admirable number of those that were slaughtered, were bruited & scattered farre and neere amongst the neighbour nations; they were surprised with a sodaine feare: so that the Kings of the Chanaanites that bordered vpon Libanus, and they also of the plaine of Chanaan, ioyned themselves confederates with the Palestines, and all of them were incensed against them, and incamped neere vnto Berotha (a Citie of the higher Galilee, not farre from Cedesa, which is also situate in the land of Chanaan.) The whole armie of them consisted of three hundred thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand chariots. This great multitude of the enemy astonished Iosuah, and the Israelites, and (by reason of the assured feare wherewith they were seized) they conceiued but little hope of obtaining the vpper hand; but God reproched him, and vpbraided him of that his timidity; and for that they suspected themselves to be scarcely secured vnder his protection, he promised them likewise that he would ouercome their enemies, and make their horses vnprofitable, and would consume their chariots by fire. Iosuah therefore was emboldened by these promises from God, and marched out against his enemies, whom he surprised on the fifth day. The encounter was strong, & the slaughter so great, that they who should but heare the same would scarcely beleue it: many also were slaine in the pursuite; so that (a few onely excepted) the whole armie was put to the sword. The Kings also were all of them slaine; and of their men there remained not any one aliue. Iosuah also commanded that their horses should be slaine, and hee burned their chariots, & securely marched thorow the whole countrey: so that no man durst sallie out, or make head against him. He besieged likewise their strong places, and killed all those whom he might apprehend. Now when the fifth yeare was fully finished, and not any one of the Chanaanites were left aliue (except such as were fled into their Cities and forts of defenses) Iosuah once more retired his campe toward the mountaines, and placed the sacred Tabernacle in the Citie of Siloe; which seemed to be a verie conuenient place, by reason of the beautie of the same, where the arke might remaine til such time as their affaires of estate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he departed with all the people to repaire vnto Sichem, and there buidied he an Altar in that place (according as before time Moses had commanded and enioyned) and hauing diuided his army, he planted the halfe of them on the mountaine of Garizim, and the other halfe on the mountain of Gebal (on which also there is an Altar) with the Leuites and the Priests; and after they had sacrificed and done their execrations, and ingrauen them on the Altars, they returned into Siloe. Now in so much as Iosuah was well strooken in yeares, & verie well perceiued that the cities of the Chanaanites were hardly to be assaulted (both in respect of the places wherein they were situate, as also for the munitions, wherewith (besides other advantages of nature) their walles were strengthened and fortified: for the Chanaanites hauing intelligence of the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, and how they hastned thitherward, to the intent vnto the extinguish and ouerthrow that nation, spent all that time in defending and fortifying their Cities) he assembled all the people in Siloe, where when (with mutuall and frequent conourse) they were assembled, he declared vnto them the happy successe which (till that time) had befallen them; and the braue executions worthy in their euents to challenge God for their author; furthermore the excellency of the ordinances vnder which they liued, alledging that the thirty one kings which had bene so hardy as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them bene overcome: that all the army that had yndertaken to ouerthrow them in battell, was wholly discomfited, so that there remained not any memory of them. But for that certaine of the Cities were taken, and the rest better defended (& for this cause more obstinate) had need of a longer assault and expugnation, he thought good that they (who had bene drawne from out the countrey situate beyond Iordan to be associates in this common cause of conquest, and by reason of affinity had made themselves copartners and companions in their perils) should be sent backe into their owne countrey with all complement of thanks, and gratuite. Afterwards, that some one of each tribe of approued vprightness and loyaltie, should be pickt out, who leuying out and surveying the countrey, might faithfully and without fraud report the greatnes thereof. This sentence was approued by the whole multitude, and thereupon diuers men were sent (accompanied with such as were skillfull in Geometry, who in respect of their science could neither erre, nor be deceived) to measure out the land, according to the goodnes thereof. For the nature of the land of Chanaan is such, that there are great plaines very fruitfull, and which (being compared with other places) might be esteemed happy and fruitfull in all sorts of fruit: but if they be compared with the other countrees of Iericho, and the land about Ierusalem, they seeme to be nothing worth.

worth: for although in generalitie the whole countrey be small, and for the greater part mountainous, yet in respect of the abundance, bountie, and incredible beauty of the fruits thereof, it is second to no other whatsoeuer. For this cause he thought good that the portions should rather bee estimated according to their value, then their measure; by reason that oftentimes one plow land was worth one thousand other. Those which were sent were ten in number, who (having trauielled ouer the whole countrey and suruaied the same) returned againe to Siloe, at the end of fixe moneths, where the Arke was kept.

Then Iofuah (taking vnto him Eleazar with the Elders, and Princes of the tribes) diuided the Region amongst nine tribes, and the halfe part of the tribe of Manasses (having an vnpartiall respect of the greatnes of euery tribe) and when as each mans lot was cast, there fell to Iudah part all the higher Iudah (which extendeth it selfe in length euen vnto Ierusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodome; to which likewise were annexed the cities of Afcalon and Gaza.) The tribe of Simeon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumæa, confining vpon Aegypt and Arabia. The Beniamites had that countrey which extendeth from Iordan vnto the sea in length, and in breadth vnto Ierusalem and Bethel: and this portion was very small (by reason that the countrey was good) for it contained the Cities of Iericho and Ierusalem. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted his portion in length, from Iordan vnto Gader; and in breadth from Bethel vnto the great plaine. The halfe tribe of the Manassites was valued from Iordan to the citie of Doi in length and in breadth vnto Bethsan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Issachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Iordan, for the limits and termes of his length, & the mountaine Iacob for the bounds of his breadth. The Zabulonites were allowed that countrey, which stretcheth our as far as Genazereth, and that abutth on the mountaine Carmel, and the sea. The countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adiudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprised the Citie of Arce, which is also called Asipus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth our from the East vnto the Citie of Damascus, and the lower Galilee as far as the mountaine of Libanus, and the head of Iordan, that issueth from the same, on that side where are the borders of the Citie of Arce on the North side. To them of Dan was assigned the valley that is extended to the Westward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the countrey of Iamnia and Gitta, from Abaron euen vnto that mountaine where beginneth the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did Iesus diuide the countrey of the fixe nations (bearing the name of Chanaan) and gaue it in possession to nine tribes and a halfe. For Amorrhæa (so called by one of the Ionnes of Chanaan) had bene already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two tribes and a halfe, as I haue already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruccans, Amatheans and Ariteans were not comprised in this diuision, neither was it tilled. But Iesus (seeing him selfe ouerburdned with yeares, and vnfit to execute in his owne person those counsels, which hee had concluded vpon; and foreseeing that the Gouernours of the people which should succeed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commaunded euery seuerall tribe in particular, that (when they should possesse the countrey thus distributed amongst them) they should not suffer any one of the race of the Chanaanites to liue. For Moses had before time tolde and perswaded them, that their securitie and the maintenance of the customes of their forefathers consisted in that one point) which hee had likewise learned by his owne experience. Further, that they should deliuer vnto the Leuites thirtie and eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the land of Amorrhæa: three of which were ordained for cities of refuge to those that fled: (for he aduised them with all consideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them) of the tribe of Iuda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nephthali, Cedesai: which is a place in higher Galilee. Morcouer he distributed vnto them the surplusage of the prey which was very great: so that not onely in publike, but in priuate, they got no small quantitie of substance, for there was so much gold and rayment, and household stuffe, and so great store of cattell and horses, as the number may not be comprehended. After which he assembled the whole armie, and to those that were planted on the other side of Iordan (who had borne armes with the rest, and were in number no lesse then fiftie thousand) he spake after this manner:

Since God (the father and master of our Hebrew nation) hath giuen this countrey into our possession, and hath promised, that (at such time as it shall bee conquered) hee will continue and conserue the same in our possession, and since likewise you haue willingly and forwardly assisted vs in all our necessities and daungers (according to Gods commaund and direction) it

Neither haue you aduentured without some reward of your trauels: for in this your warfare you are intiched, and shal beare away with you a great prey both of gold and siluer: and besides all these, our beneuolence and loue, tied vnto you with all alacritie and readiness whensoever you shall haue cause to vs vs. For we haue neither forgot nor let light by Moses commaund before he departed out of this life; and haue spared no endeuour, wherby you might allie and tie our affections to you: we therefore dismisse you to your owne possessions in complete fullnes of your delight, praying you to remember your selues onely of these things; & that you will suppose that no terme can terminate our kinred: Neither (by reason of the entercourse of the riuer Iordan betwixt you and vs) suppose you vs to bee any others then Hebrewes. For all of vs (both those that dwell on this side, and on the other side of Iordan) are the posteritie of Abraham: and one and the same God hath brought to light both yours and our progenitors; whose lawes and religion (instituted by Moses) are diligently to be obserued: for by this meanes, hee will become our helper and fauourer; as on the contrarie side (if we shall degenerate from his statutes) he will be an enemy against vs. After hee had spoken vnto them after this manner, he embraced in particular all those that were in dignitie, and in general the whole people. This done, he stayed in that place, but the rest of the whole people conueyed them onward with teares, and they departed the one from the other with great grieve and remembrance. But after that the tribe of Ruben and of Gad, and the rest of the Manassites had passed ouer Iordan; they builded an Altar vpon the banke of the riuer, that might serue for a memoriall to posteritie; and a token for the present of the coniunction, which they had with those that dwell on the other side of Iordan. But when the tidings hereof came vnto their eares that dwell on the further side of the riuer, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar; but notwithstanding were ignorant of the respect and cause they had in building it, they supposed that seeking to innouate their religion, they would introduce the seruice of forraine and false gods: and being rashly stirred vp with this suspition of the violation of their religion, they put themselves in armes with this resolution, to reuenge themselves of those who had builded that Altar, and to take punishment of them for that they had forsaken the lawes and ordinances of their forefathers. For they supposed that they were not so farre to respect their parentage or dignitie (who were accused) as to forget the will of God, and that seruice which was agreeable in his sight: for which cause (being in this manner incensed) they prepared themselves to the expedition. But Iofuah and the high Priest Eleazar, with the rest of the Elders restrained them; counselling them first of all to found their deliberation, and afterward (if it should bee apparant vnto them that they did it vnder a sinister intent) at that time they might lawfully inuade them by the sword. Hereupon they sent Phinees the sonne of Eleazar, and ten other of the most noblest amongst the Hebrewes, as Embassadors vnto them, to know what the intent and reason was, why they had builded that Altar on the banke of Iordan.

Now when these Embassadors had past the flood, and were come amongst them, they summoned an assembly, and Phinees standing vp in the midst of them, spake after this manner. You haue committed so heinous an offence (saith hee) as there is no question either to reprove or punish the same hence forward in words: yet notwithstanding wee haue not vpon the instant taken armes, neither assaulted you in battell, or had reference or regard to the heinousnesse of your crime, to the intent to punish you, but wee haue bin sent to you as Embassadors (in consideration of our alliance) & for that (as we suppose) you may be drawn by good perswasions to the acknowledgement and detestation of your misdeeds; to the end that when we are informed of the cause that hath induced you to erect this Altar, it might not be thought that wee haue headlong thrust our selues into armes against you, if vnder an holy affection you haue builded the same: and if it appeareth otherwise, that the offence is iustly imputed and grounded against you; we may take reuenge of the same, according as reason requieth. For scarcely could we beleue that you (who are inwardly grounded in the knowledge of God, and who are hearers of those lawes which he himselfe hath giuen you) should (since your departure from vs, and vpon your arriuall in your owne patrimonie (which you haue obtained by lot by the meanes of his grace, and perceably enioy by the power of his prouidence) should forget him, so soon as to forsake the Tabernacle, Arke, and Altar, which we haue by hereditarie right received from our progenitors, and introduce strange Gods, to the intent to be partakers of the impieties of the Chanaanites.

But if you repent your misdeedes, and plunge your selues no further in so great madnesse, but reclaime your thoughts, and reuerence your domestical and auncient lawes, the pardon is graun-ted you: but if you obstinately persist in your wickednes, we will refuse no trauell for the maintenance of our liues, but passing the riuer in defence both of them (or to speake more fully) of our God, and accounting you no lesse hatefull and impious then Chanaanites, wee will utterly root out and raze both their memorie, and your posteritie together. For doe not suppose this, that because you haue past the riuer, you are exempt from Gods power, because in what place soeuer you bee, you are numbred amongst them that appertaine vnto him; and it is impossible for you to auoid either his power, or his vengeance: And if you thinke that the place is an impediment and let vnto you from following the better course, it were better for you to make a new diuision of lands, and leaue this region to bee conuerted into pastures. It behooueth you therefore to grow better aduised, and that changing your purpose, you desist from innovation: Whereunto wee exhort you by that loue which you beare to your children and wiues, and besech you by the respect you hold of that which is most deare vnto you, that you inforce vs not to wage war against you, who are wholly vnwilling to listen to your iniuries. Resolue your selues therefore in this present matter, assuring your selues that therein consisteth the issue, whether you had rather perpetually enioy your peace and affections by our perswasion, or expose both you and yours to the perill of a bloody warre.

The Rubenites
answer.

After that Phinees had finished this his oration, they that were the Peeres and principals of the assembly, gaue this answer in defence of the common cause. Men and brethren, neither will wee neglect our kinned, neither innouate any thing in that religion, of which wee make account: we know that there is one God comon vnto all the nation of the Hebrewes, and acknowledge also his brazen Altar which is before the Tabernacle, and no other but that shall receiue our sacrifices. As for that which we haue now erected, and that breedeth in you at this present a cause of suspition, we built it not to the intent to pacifie God by sacrifices, but that it might remaine as a perpetuall argument of our friendship, and might admonish vs of our countrey religion, not to the end you should suspect it were an induction toward the violating of religion:
And that this was the onely cause which allured and induced vs to build the same, we onely challenge God for our faithfull witnesse (for which cause hereafter conceiue a better opinion of vs) and God forbid you should suppose vs to be so besotted in that sinne, of which, whosoever of Abrahams posteritie is guiltie, and whosoever shall degenerate from the manners and customes of his forefathers, may not expiate that crime without a capitall punishment. As soone as Phinees had heard these things, and praised their constancie; he returned vnto Iesus, and declared all those things vnto the people: who reioycing (in that they had no occasion to leuie men, nor cause of ciuill warre or bloodshed) offered vnto God their sacrifices of thankgiuing; and presently dissolving the assembly, each man returned vnto his owne home, but Iesus chose his habitation in Sichama. Twenty yeares after: Iosuah being extremely olde (calling vnto him the most honourable of euery Citie, and both the Elders and Magistrates, and as many of the people as might commodiously be assistant) spake vnto them after this maner. First he called vnto their remembrance the diuers benefites which God had bestowed vpon them, by meanes whereof from their poore and afflicted estates, they had attained to so great riches and glory: then exhorted he them, that they should endeavour themselves hereafter in such sort as God might hold and continue his mercifull hand ouer them; since they knew, that his beneuolence could be allied vnto them by no other meanes, but by their good inducements: he further alledged, that it was his dutie before he departed out of this life to admonish them of their dutie; last of all he required them that they should accept of that his good admonition, and should bee perpetually mindfull of the same. After this his oration hee paid the due of nature, and died in the hundredth and tenth yeere of his life; whereof hee spent fortie as minister vnder Moses their magistrate, and after his death, gouerned the common-weale twentie five yeares: a man of incomparable both prudence and eloquence. Moreouer strong and expedite in matter of gouernment, and both good and profitable in affaires of peace; finally most exact in all sorts of vertue: hee was buried in a Citie called Thamna belonging to the Tribe of the Ephraimites. About the same time likewise died

A laid on his sepulcher is extant in the Citie Gabatha. After their deaths Phinees being demanded by the people what Gods pleasure was, and to whose charge the affaires and warres against the Chanaanites should be committed, answered them that God commanded them to giue the gouernment to the tribe of Iuda, which by election chose Simeon and his, they for their associates vndertook the war vnder this condition, that when they had utterly rooted out the remnant of the Chanaanites out of their owne dition, they should likewise employ themselves to extinguish all the reliques of that race amongst the other tribes.

B How the Israelites after the death of their Emperour, forgetting the religion of their forefathers, fell into extreame calamities: and how thorow a civil war raised amongst them, there were onely 600. of the tribe of BENIAMIN left aline.

BEVt the Chanaanites (whose estate at that time was in sufficient security) expected them with a great host about the Citie of Bezeca, hauing their army conducted by the king of that place called Adoni-Bezeca, which name signifieth Lord of the Bezecenites: (for Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to say as Lord) now these men promised vnto themselues the vpper hand, by reason that Iosuah was deceased. Against these (of whom I haue fore-spoken) the two tribes fought very valiantly, and slaying tenne thousand of them (whilest they pursued the rest) they tooke Adoni-Bezeca captiue, who hauing his hands and feete cut off, ac-knowledgeed the diuine iustice: for he confessed that he had vsed leuentie and two kings before times after the same manner. In this plight they conducted him neere vnto Ierusalem, where departing out of this life they buried him. Then ouerran they the country, sackeing and taking the Cities, and after they had diuers of them in their possession they besieged Ierusalem, and entring the lower Citie thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the sword. But the higher towne was very hard to be assaulted (by reason of the fortresses and strength of the walles, and the naturall and strong situation of the place) which was the cause that they leuied their campe to goe and besiege Hebron, which they took, & slew all those that were therein. In that time there were some remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in stature, and vnlike vnto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be seen as yet at this day, which for their highnesse surpasse all credulity or conceit. This Citie was giuen in waie of honour to the Leuites with two thousand cubits of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the rest of the countrey it was freely giuen to Caleb, according as Moses had commanded it (this was one of those spies which Moses sent to ouerlook the land of Chanaan.) They gaue lands and possessions likewise to Iethro the Madianites posteritie (who was father in law to Moses) for that they had forsaken their owne territories, and annexed themselves to the Israelites, and had bene with them in the desert. The tribe of Iuda and Simeon tooke those Cities of the mountaynous coun-trei of Chanaan, and those that were in the Plaine neare vnto the sea coast (namely Ascalon and Azoth.) But as touching Gaza and Accaron, they escaped: for these Cities being in the Plaine, and defended with a great number of chariots, repulled those that assaulted the same to their disaduantage. So these two tribes hauing had good successe in warres, retired themselves into their Cities, and laide aside their weapons.

As touching the Beniamites to whom Ierusalem appertained, they receiued the inhabitants thereof as their tributaries, so that all of them being in peace, and the one ceasing from slaughter, and the other assured from danger, both of them employed themselves in manuring the coun-trei. The rest of the tribes did the like, conforming themselves according to the example of the Beniamites, and contenting themselves to receiue their tributes, they suffred the Chanaanites to liue in peace. The tribe of Ephraim (besieging the Citie of Bethel) could not see such an end of their desseigne, as the length of time and the trauels they had taken in the siege required: and although they were very much toyled and wearied with the same, yet desisted they not the continuance of the siege. At last they took one of the Citie (who issued forth to find our certaine necessary things that he wanted) whom they assured that if he would deliuer them the Citie, they would saue him, and grant life and liberty likewise to all them that were of his linage; who swore vnto them that he would deliuer the City into their hand: which when he had performed, both he and his were wholly warranted; but all the rest of the inhabitants were put to the sword. From that time forward the Israelites behaued themselves more mildly towards the enemy, and im-

played them in tillage of their lands, and husbanding their fruits: and being grown in riches they followed the delights and pleasures of the world, yea in such sort grew they dissolute, that they had no mind neither of their policy, nor the lawes of their forefathers. Whereupon God was grievously incensed against them, who gaue them to vnderstand first of all, that contrary to his command they had spared the Chanaanites: & afterwards, that those Chanaanites in time to come should exercise great cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at that which was declared vnto them, yet notwithstanding they took no pleasure in feats of armes, both for that they had receiued many profits by the Chanaanites, as also for that (being effeminate thorow delights) they were vnapt for labor. It hapned then at such time as their Aristocratical gouernment was corrupted, & that they respected not their elders, or any other magistrates before time ordained, & were extreamely addicted vnto gaine, & infinitely tooke pleasure therein; that amidst their greatest security, a grievous mutiny and commotion was once more raised amongst them, so that at length they fel at oddes one with another, on that occasion which ensueth.

A certaine Leuite and one of them of the common sort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephraimites, took a wife that was borne in the City of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Iuda, whom (by reason of hir incomparable beautie) he most intirely loued; and found himselfe much aggrieved, for that he found not her affection answerable to his loue: at last his passion so much preuailed with him, as they grew at odds, and fell into contentious dislikes, whence at last it fell out that the woman (tired with disquiet) forsook her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband fore aggrieved thereat (by reason of the loue which he bare her) came vnto her fathers house and appealed the differents, and was reconciled vnto her: There abode hee for the space of foure dayes, being friendly intreated and intertained by his wifes father and mother. On the fifth day, he thought good to returne to his owne dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reason that the father and the mother gaue them a loth farewell, and consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a seruant which followed them and an asselike, on which the woman was mounted. Now when they had trauelled the space of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew neare the City of Ierusalem: their seruant counselled them to take vp their lodging in some place, for feare least by their late trauell they might fall into some disaster, the rather for that they were not farre from the enemies country, and that the present time was such, as might make those things that were most assured, suspected. But this opinion of his pleased not his master, who would not lodge amongst those of a forraigne nation (for the city pertained to the Chanaanites) but his intent was to passe further, and trauell yet twenty furlongs more, to take vp his lodging in one of their cities. This aduise of his being allowed, they came to Gaba of the Tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and whereas they found no man in the market place that might lodge them; at length a certaine old man, returning out of the country to his house (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting with him, asked him what he was, and for what cause so late as it was hee sought for his supper? He answered, that he was a Leuite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, and was returning to his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man hauing regard vnto parentage (by reason that he was of the same tribe, and that by good hap they had after that manner met the one with the other) lodged him in his owne house. But certaine young men amongst the Gabeonites, perceiuing the woman in that place, were rauished in admiration of her beautie and good graces, and getting some notice afterwards that she had been brought thither as a guest, they set light by him (by reason of his weaknes and age, and the small retinue that he had in his house) and came and knockt at his doore. The olde man required them to depart, and that they should offer him no violence, nor to her outrage. But contrariwise they importuned him to deliuer them his guest, and that done they promised him in no sort to procure his further molestation. But although that the olde man alleged that she was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Leuite, and that they should commit an hainous offence, in sinning for their corrupt pleasures sake against the lawes: yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, menacing him likewise to murder him, because hee hindered them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driuen to that exigent, that (to their intent they should not offer violence to his guest, and a stranger) he abandoned and prostituted vnto them his owne daughter, supposing it to be a lesse inconuenient to let them satisfie their vbridled concupiscence on her, than that his guest should suffer any villany; at leastwise he made this account, that by this meanes he should not be guiltie of any iniury done vnto them. Notwithstanding all this, they intermitted not to sollicite and vrge the deliuerie of the woman (being incensed

Twenty two thousand Israelites slaine in battell. Eightene thousand Israelites more slaine. The Israelites place one half of their battell in ambush, and as if they fought with disadvantage they retired by little and little.

A incensed in vnbridled lust towards her.) Contrariwise he besought them that they would not be so audacious as to violate the lawes: but they seconded their disordinate desires with extreame violence, and rauished her perforce, and led her to their owne lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lewdly appeased their lusts on her) they thrust her out of doores from them vpon the breake of day. But she being wholly desolate, and discomforted by this disaster, returned to her lodging, and both by reason of the agonie which she had suffered, as also for the shame that hindered her from appearing before her husband, who would bee incredibly and extreamely tormented with that accident, she fell downe and gaue vp the ghost. Her husband supposing that she was onely seised with some sound sleepe (not suspecting any other inconuenient) thought to awake her, with that deliberation to comfort her, because shee had not willingly condescended to their violences and lusts, but maugre her resist was rauished by them, and taken out of his lodging. But so soone as he perceiued that she was dead, he moderated his affections, considering the extremitie of his euills, and laying the dead body vpon his Ass, he carried it to his house; where he no sooner arriued, but that he diuided and cut the same into twelue pieces, which he sent to the twelue tribes of Israel; commanding them that bare the same to tel euery tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife, and what villany they had practiced against her. The tribes were very much discontented at that which they both saw, and heard (hauing neuer before that time heard of any the like aduventure) and incensed with extreame displeasure (and yet iust) they assembled themselves in Siloe: and being arraunged before the Arke, they resolved sodainly to take armes, and to assaile the Gabeonites as their capitall and mortall enemies. But the elders with-held them, declaring vnto them that they ought not after that manner enterprise a headlong warre against their brethren, before they had conferred and debated the cause with them, and examined the crimes wherof they were accused; the rather, for that the law permitteth not any war (no not against strangers) before an enterparle & embassage, which might reclaim those that were held culpable & reduce them to reason. For which cause they tolde them that they should conforme themselves, both according to the letter of the lawe, and the bond of brotherhood, to send certaine messengers to the Gabeonites to demand at their hands the authors of that villany, to the end that when they were deliuered, they might take their satisfaction by their punishment: but if they should not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to assaile them with open warre. Hereupon they sent certaine messengers to the Gabeonites to accuse those young men that had perpetrated that indignity against the woman, to demand them at their hands, to the intent they might suffer condigne punishment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yeeld vp the young men, supposing it to be an indignity for them for feare of war to be obedient to other mens commandements, by reason that they thought themselves no waies inferior vnto others in feats of warre, both in respect of their number, and the courage both in the one & the other. The rest of the tribe also made great preparation, by reason they were all of the resolved, and vnited together, mutually to defend themselves against whosoever should assaile them. After that the report of the Gabeonites answer was brought vnto the Israelites, they sware an oth the one vnto the other, that none of them would giue their daughters in marriage to a Beniamite, promising each of them to issue & make warre against them: against whom they were more incensed, then our predecessors haue been animated against the Chanaanites, as we haue bin giuen to vnderstand. They speedily therefore leuiued & led into the field an army of 400000. men against them. The Beniamites host consisted of 26000. armed men, and 600. others; 50. of which were expert in shooting, and fighting with the left hand. The felde was fought neer to Gaba, wherein the Beniamites put the Israelites to flight; who were slaine to the number of 22000. and more of them had beene slaughtered that day, had not the night sodainly ouertaken them and ended the skirmish. Thus did the Beniamites ioufully return vnto their Cities, and the Israelites were discomforted thorow their vnexpected calamitie. The next day they once more renewed the battell, and the Beniamites had the vpper hand once againe: so that the Israelites lost eightene thousand men more, and by that mean forsooke their campe thorow feare, and retired to Bethel, which was not farre off from the place. The day after they fasted, and belought God (by the mediation of Phinees the high Priest) that it would please him to appease his wrath against them, and that contenting himselfe with the two ouerthrowes which he had sent them, he would now at last both giue them victory and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promised them by the prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they diuided their army into two parts, and laid the one thereof in ambush neere vnto the Citie. In the meane time (whilest the other halfe that made head against the Beniamites retired themselves, to the intent their enemies should assault them) the Beniamites suddenly issued, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (vnder purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemy insisted: so that all they likewise, who thorough age and weaknesse were left in the City, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawne far enough from the City, the Hebrewes staied, made head, and fought against them. Then gaue they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who suddenly issuing out together, rushed in upon their enemies with a huge crie. VVho seeing themselves so suddenly surprised knewe not what to doe, but retiring themselves into certaine Baricadoes, they defended themselves with arrowes, but all of them were slaine, except it were six hundred: who making head, and closely filleted and embattailed together, thrust themselves desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this meanes escaped they into the mountaines hard by, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of twenty five thousand or thereabouts were slaine.

Five & twenty thousand Beniamites slaine, & onely sixe hundred escape alive. Iabes & other Cities of the Beniamites burned. Ind. 21.

The Israelites reuoke the six hundred that were fled.

The Israelites gaue the Beniamites the foure hundred virgins of Iabes in marriage.

When & how an oath ought to be kept.

The Beniamites are permitted to ravish them wiues.

And the Israelites burned Gaba vterly, & slew both the women and children. They exercised no lesse iustice on the other cities of Beniamin (so much were they fleshed & transported with fury.) And for that Iabes (a Citie of Galad) would not ioyne with them in battell against the Beniamites, they sent twelve thousand chosen men out of their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might beare armes, with their wiues and children, except foure hundred virgins. So much griefe and fury had they conceived thorow the accident that chaunced to this woman, and the despight they had conceived against the Beniamites for prouoking them vnto armes: which furie when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselves, reputing them selves to be deprived of one tribe: And although they thought them iustly oppressed in battell (by reason they had offended against the lawes of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalfe of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and reuoked those sixe hundred that were fled, and helde a certaine rocke in the desert which is called Rhoa. The Embassadors complained not onely for that the warre had extinguished them, but also for that the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they preuailed so much, that they bare their crosse and losse with less griefe; & they came vnto them & besought them that they would not giue sentence of the total extincion of the tribe of Beniamin. We grant you (said they) the reuenues of your whole tribe, and as much booty as you may driue away. But they acknowledging their iniustice, and that they were condemned by the iust iudgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe, and the Israelites gaue them in marriage those foure hundred virgins of Iabes: and for the rest (which were two hundred) they deliberated with themselves how they might prouide them of wiues, to the intent they might haue issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their warre it was decreed by an oth, that none of them might match his daughter with anie of the tribe of Beniamin; there were some of them that thought good that the oth might be dispensed withal (by reason it was grounded vpon wrath, & not on iudgement) alleging further, that they should do nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might saue a tribe which was in daunger vterly to be extinct: That periuries were dangerous and noisome, not at such time as they are enforced by constraint, but when they are practiced with an intent to do euill. But when as the Elders reclaimed hereagainst (abhorring the mention of periury) there arose vp a certaine man amongst them, that said he had a policie, whereby without breach of oth the Beniamites might light vpon wiues. And being commanded by the Senate to expresse the same, wee haue a custome cuery yeare (sayd hee) to assemble and keepe a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we haue both our wiues and daughters: as many of these as they can ravish, let the Beniamites lay hold of, without reproofe (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by vs) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require reuenge, wee will say that they are in the fault who haue negligently kept their daughters, & that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Beniamites, for that we had too much already vied & abused the same towards them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Beniamites to ravish and violently take to themselves wiues amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Beniamites (of whom we haue spoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush neere vnto the Citie (amongst the vines and other thickets, and close places, in which they might hide themselves to surpris the Damscella) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wantoned on their way: but the young men breaking from their ambush, laid holde of them (being scattered and diuided here and there) and after they had married them they departed home to labour their land, and began to studie

A new how to recouer their former good hap. Thus the tribe of Beniamin (which was welny vnterly exterminated) was restored to his former dignity after this manner, by the wisdom of the Israelites: and it incontinently flourished and encreased in a litle time, as well in number of men as in all other things. Thus finished this fatal warre.

The like accident hapned to the Tribe of Dan, which fell into the like incombrance for this cause which ensueth.

The Israelites about this time hauing forgotten the exercise of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Chanaanites (in contempt of that nation) raised forces, not for that they were affraide of their owne estates, but to the intent that ouerlopping the Hebrewes with some memorable ouerthrow, they might more securely inhabit their Cities thereafter: and conspiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and ioyning to them certaine chariots) they drew Ascalon and Acharen (two cities within the lot of Juda) into their confederacy, and diuers other Cities of the champaigne country: so as they of Dan were driuen into the mountaines, hauing no place in the champaign where they might peaceably inhabit; who (for that neither in warre they were able to confront them, neither had sufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) sent five men of their tribe into the champaigne country and Midland, to spie if they could finde any place that were fit and conuenient for them to establish and fixe their colonies in. These trauelled a daies iourney nor farr from the mountaine of Libanus, and more lower then are the sources of Jordan, bordering vpon the great plaine of the citie of Sidon. In which place (hauing obserued that the land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made it known vnto their people, who traouailing thither with their army, builded a citie in that place called Dan (by the name of the sonne of Iacob so called, and in honor of the tribe of Dan). Many aduersities befell the Israelites from that time forwards, both for that they were vnexercised in trauell, and for that they contemned pietie. For hauing once forsaken the obseruation of their ordinances, they suffered themselves to be deuoured in pleasures, liuing according to their owne appetites: so that they gorged and glutted themselves with those vices, which were most of all accustomed and vsuall amongst the Chanaanites.

CHAP. III.

D How the people of Israell by reason of their wickednesse, were by God deliuered to the seruitude of the Assyrians.

For this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort, as (thorow their negligence) they lost the good which they had gotten by infinite trauell. For Schisart king of the Assyrians leued an army against them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or composition, took diuers of them prisoners; and brought their city vnder his subiectio. Diuers also willingly submitted themselves vnto him, (thorow the feare they had conceived) and they paid tributes exceeding their powers, induring all kinde of outrage for the space of eight yeares, after which they were deliuered by these means following.

A Certaine man of the tribe of Juda called Cenizus, a man of execution and of braue courage, was aduertised by a voice from heauen, that hee should not permit the Israelites in that sort to be reduced into so extreame necessity, without taking care for them, but that hee ought to aduenture himselfe to set them at liberty. For which cause, calling vnto him some few companions of his perills, who were discontented with their present estate, and desired a change, he first of all ditcomfited the garrison which Schisart had placed ouer them: and so much was he furthered with his first successe, that the number of his followers increased more & more; so that they seemed sufficient to equall the enemy in open field: wherupon encountering him in one battaile, they ouercame him, and recovered their libertie; and the rest of the scattered and confused army retired themselves toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect giuen proofe of his valour, he receiued the gouernment at the peoples hands, and exercised the office of iudge forty yeares, at the end whereof he died.

After whose death (the government and seate being void) the affaires of the Israelites began againe to fall to ruine, and the rather for that they neither yeelded due honour vnto God, neither obedience to the laws: whence it came to pass, that Eglon king of the Moabites (seeing the disorder of their policie) set them at nought, so that he waged war against them, and ouercame them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater force then any of his predecessors, he fought against them & weakened their forces, & constrained them to pay tribute.

This man (translating his court to Iericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no meanes whereby hee might vex and molest the people: so that they liued for the space of 18. yeares in great miserie. But God (being moued with their calamities, and supplications) deliuered them from their intolerable thralldome after this manner. Iodes the sonne of Gera of the tribe of Beniamin (a young man, both addressed by valour of minde, and strength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Iericho. This man insinuated himselfe into Eglons familiaritie, and by presents and gifts entertained and courted him in such sort, as hee was well beloued and esteemed amongst all those courtiers that were neere about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certaine presents vnto the king (attended by two of his household seruants) he secretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at such time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid sommer and mid-day likewise, whereby the watch was growne the more careless and slothful, partly by reason of the heate, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The young man therefore offering his presents vnto Eglon (who at that time disported himselfe in a certaine sommer chamber) began to discourse with him. Now they were both alone (by reason that the king resolving to talke familiarly with Iodes, had sent away his guard, and late him downe in a seate :) but Iodes feare, least failing to stab home enough, he should not giue him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to rise, telling him that he had a dreame to report vnto him by the commandement of God. Whereat he reioicing very much, leapt from his seate; whereupon Iodes stabd him to the heart: and leauing the poinard sticking in his wound, he escaped and locked the doore after him; the guard making no noise at all, supposing that the king had laide him downe to rest. But Iodes giuing priuate notice hereof to them of Iericho, offered himselfe to bee their leader in the recovery of their former liberty: who (willingly accepting therof) presently took arms, and sent trumpets to publish the same thorow the whole country: (for after that manner were they wont to assemble the people.) They that were about Eglon were wholly ignorant of that which hapned: but about the euen-tide (feare, lest some mishap had befallne him) they entred into the place where he was, & found him dead; whereat they were greatly astonished, so as they knew not what to doe. For before they had assembled their forces together, the Israelites fiercely charged them, and some they killed instantly; the rest that were ten thousand in number, betooke themselves to flie, vnder hope to recover their country of moab: but the Israelites (hauiug before that, laide and fortified the passages of Iordan) pursued them and slew them: so that diuers of them perished in the Ferry, & not one of them remained that escaped their hands. By this meanes the Israelites were deliuered from the seruitude of the Moabites: and for this cause Iodes was aduanced to the government of the people. Finally, after hee had liued for the space of fourescore yeares, he died. A man (besides the act of late rehearsed) worthy of praye in all other things. After him Sanagar the sonne of Anath was elected gouernor, and in the first year of his raigne, he left this life to partake the fruition of another.

How the Israelites were brought vnder the subiection of the Chananites, and ransomed from seruitude by BARAC.

BVt the Israelites (in no sort reclaimed or reconciled by their forepassed calamities) fell againe into their former impiety and disobedience: and before they had sufficiently shaken off the seruitude of the Moabites, were subiectd vnto Iabin king of the Chananites. This man kept his residence imperially at Afor (a Citie situate on the lake of Sachonites)

A he had in pay thirtie thousand foote, and ten thousand horse: and besides these, hee had three thousand warlike Chariots. Quer all this huge armie commaunded Sisares (an especial man amongst the kings favorites) who encountering with the Israelites, brought their affaires into desperate an estate, that they willingly (for their owne securitie sake) accepted seruitude, and paid tribute (whereunto they were enforced through the austeritie of their subiection, almost for the space of twentie yeares, not daring to lift vp their heads) all which fell vpon them by the will of God, to the end he might punish the too great contumacie and ingratitude of that nation. Who at length repenting themselves, and acknowledging the cause of their calamities (namely that it proceeded from the contempr of their lawes) they repaired to a certaine Prophetesse called Deborah (which name in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a Bee) beseeching her that by her prayers she would endeavour to prouoke God vnto mercie (to the intent he should not suffer them so to be oppressed by the Chanaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compassion on them) granted them helpe, and appointed Barac to bee their gouernour (a man of the tribe of Nephthali, whose name signifieth lightning. Deborah therefore sending for Barac commaunded him to picke out, and muster ten thousand chosen men, and lead them forth against the enemy: alleading that they were sufficient to obtaine the victorie which God had promised by his Oracle. But Barac denying to vndertake the government, except shee also would ad- minister the same with him, she moued therewith, spake thus: Wilt thou (said she) surrender the dignitie which God hath giuen thee, to a woman? well I will not refuse it. Whereupon leuying ten thousand men, they pitched their tents neere to the mountaine of Itabyr. Sisara at that time (according as the king had commanded him) presently marched out to meete them, and encamped himselfe not farr from the enemy. But Barac and the rest of the Israelites (being terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Deborah, who commanded them that verie day to enter and vndertake the battell, assuring them that the victorie should be theirs, and that God would both asist and helpe them: whereupon they charged the enemy, and there sodainly fell a storme of raine mixed with haile, which the winde droue against the faces of the Chanaanites, and tooke away their sight, making those that carried darts, and such as serued with the sling, vnprofitable in their seruice: the Targetiers likewise hauing their hands benumbed with colde, could scarcely wield their swords. But the tempest beating on the backs of the Israelites, not onely wrought them lesse offence, but made them also more forward (being wher- ted thereunto by the manifest signe of Gods fauour and preience.) Whereupon disarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battell, they made a great slaughter of them, so as part of them fell by the weapons of the Israelites: the rest were ouerrunne by their owne horsemens and chariots. Sisara also as soone as he saw his souldiers turne their backs (leaping from his chariot) fled away hastily, till at last hee arriued in the tent of a woman of Cenitis called Tael, who being desired by him to conceale and hide him, entertained him: and whereas he required drinke shee gaue him sowe milke, which when he had ouergreedily drunke, he fell asleepe: and whilst hee so lay buried in his slumbers, Tael tooke a mallet and droue an yron nayle thorow his temples, & fastned him to the pauement: and anon after, when Baracs souldiers came vnto her, she shewed him vnto them, in such manner as he was nailed. And thus a woman (according as Deborah had foretold) was the author of this victorie. But Barac leading his armie to Afor, slew Iabin that came out against him: and hauing slaine the king, and leuelled the citie with the ground, hee gouerned the Israelites for the space of fortie yeares.

How the Amalechites ouercomming the Israelites, destroyed their country for the space of seuen yeares.

BVt when Barac and Deborah were dead, about the very same time and hard after, the Madianites (accompanied with the Amalechites and Arabians) armed themselves against the men of Israel; and encountering them in open field ouercame them in a great battell, and destroying their fruits and haruest led away a great prey, and when as they continued these their incursions for the space of seuen yeares, they compelled the Israelites to forsake the champaigne, and flie vnto the mountaines: who digging them dens and houses vnder the earth, kept all that secretly hiddē which they had reserved & conueied from the furie of the enemy. For the Madianites inuading them in the sommer time, permitted the Israelites to plie their husbandrie in the winter, to the intent they might spoile and depopulate their country.

CHAP. VIII.

How GEDDON deliuered the Israelites.

God commaunded Gedeon to deliuer the Israelites from the Madianites Iudg. 7.

God commaunded Gedeon to chooſe a few men. The victory is to be attributed to God.

Gedeon repaired to the enemies tents, and by them is confirmed by a dreame.

Gedeon with three hundred men: and hee with the sight.

About that time, Gedeon (the sonne of Iafus, one of the chiefeſt of the tribe of Manaſſes) ground certaine sheaves of corne, which he had ſecretly conueied into his preſſe: for hee durſt not bring them openly, for feare the enemy ſhould haue eſpied him. To him appeared there a viſion in the forme of a young man, which ſaid vnto him, that he was happy and beloued of God: and that a certaine ſigne of his good happe ſhould bee, that hee ſhould vie his preſſe in ſteed of his grange; willing him to be of good courage, and to endeouour himſelfe to recouer his countries libertie. Gedeon answered, that it was impoſſible, by reaſon that the tribe whereof he was deſcended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and feeble to thinke on affaires of ſo great conſequence: but God promiſed him to ſupply his neceſſities in whatſoeuer he held himſelfe deficient; and aſſured him (vnder his conduct) that he would giue the Israelites the victorie. Theſe things Gedeon communicated with certaine young men, who willingly beleeuing the Oracle, answered, that for the preſent they had ten thouſand ſouldiers in a readineſſe, moſt readie to attempt any thing in regard of their libertie. But God appeared to Gedeon in a dreame, and told him that men naturallie were, louers of themſelues, and haters of thoſe who were excellent in vertues: ſo that if there grow any queſtion of victorie, they forget God, and appropriate the ſame vnto themſelues, ſaying; that they are many, and all valiant men at armes. To the end therefore that they may conceiue his handie worke in their diſcuerance, hee counſelled him that about the mid-time of the day, at ſuch time as the heate was moſt vehement, he ſhould conduſt his armie to the riuer; and that beeing there, hee ſhould diligently obſerue thoſe that bowed themſelues to drinke, which hee might eſteeme for men of valour: but all thoſe that dranke haſtily and with noiſe, ſhould bee marked as men fearfull and afraid of the enemy. Gedeon did according as God had commaunded him, and there were found three hundred men that liſted water to their mouthes with their hands, with feare and trouble: God willed him that he ſhould aſſaile the enemy with thoſe three hundred, promiſing that he would giue him the victorie. About this time were they incamped vpon the banke of Jordan, ready to paſſe the foord the next morrow. But Gedeon was ſore troubled, by reaſon that God had before times tolde him that he ſhould aſſaile the enemy by night: but God willing to deliuer him of his feare, commanded him to take one of his ſouldiers with him, and enter the campe of the Madianites, aſſuring him that he ſhould be both aduiſed and encouraged by themſelues: whereunto hee obeyed, and for his better aſſurance, hee tooke with him one of his ſeruants. Now as he drew nigh a certaine tent, hee perceiued that they that were within the ſame were awake, and that one of them with a loud voice, tolde his companion the dreame which that night hee had had; which Gedeon ouerheard, and thus it was. Him ſeemed that he ſaw a barley cake (ſo loathſome as no man would feed vpon the ſame) which rowled thorow the camp, which firſt ouerthrew the kings tent, & afterward the tents of all his ſouldiers: alleading that this viſion ſignified the loſſe of the whole army. Annexing to this his allegation the reaſons that induced him thereunto; namely that of all ſorts of corne, barley is moſt contemptible; and amongſt all the nations of Aſia, there were not this day any people to bee found more diſgraced and contemned then the Israelites, and that in this reſpect they reſembled barley. That which at this day ſeemeth to encourage them is Gedeon, and the army that is with him; and whereas this cake turned to ouerthrow our tents, I feare me leaſt God hath giuen ſome ſigne of victorie vnto Gedeon. Gedeon (hauing ouerheard all theſe things) conceiued good hope, and attempted with a valiant heart, and preſently commanded his domeſticall ſeruants to arme themſelues, diſcourſing vnto them the viſion which appeared to their enemy: wherevpon they ſpeedily prepared themſelues at his commaundement, ruminating and hammering in their mindes vpon that diſcourſe which hee had declared vnto them. About the latter watch of the night, Gedeon led forth his armie, and diuided them into three bands, and in euery band he put a hundred men: all of theſe bare in their hands emptic pots, in which were hidden burning torches, in ſuch ſort as the enemy might not diſcouer them when they ſallied out: moreover they bare rams hornes in their right hands, which they vſed in ſteed of trumpets. The aduerſe armie tooke vp much ground (by

A reaſon that they had a great number of Camels, and were diſtributed by nations) yet notwithstanding were all of them comprehended in one incloſure.

The Hebrewes hauing had inſtructions from their captaine what they ought to doe, at ſuch time as they approached neere vnto their enemies, & the ſigne of the battell was giuen, they founded their hornes, and brake their pots, & with their flaming lights brake into the enemies camp; crying victorie, victorie, by the aſſiſtance of God, and the ſtrength of Gedeon. Hereupon ſuch a trouble & feare ſurpriſed the enemy, as they lay aſleepe (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue) that few of them fell by the Hebrewes ſword, but they themſelues ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in language.)

B For conſuſedly encountering one another, they maſſacred all thoſe that encountered them, ſuppoſing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this ſlaughter, & Gedeon's victorie came vnto the eares of the reſt of the Israelites, they armed themſelues, and purſued & ouertooke the enemy (being intangled & circumuſed in certaine places made vnpaſſable thorow many running brooks) ſo that being inuiroed on euery ſide, they were all of them put to the ſword, amongſt which were their two kings Oreb and Zeb. The reſt of the chieftaines trouping onward with their ſouldiers to the number of eightene thouſand or thereabouts, encamped not far from the Israelites: But Gedeon was no waies aſtoniſhed hereat, but purſuing them valiantly with his whole armie, & charging them deſperately, he diſcomfited all the reſt of the enemies, & led away captiues thoſe chieftaines which remained, namely Zeeb & Ezabon. There died in this battell of the Madianites and Arabians their allies to the number almoſt of fix ſcore thouſand: beſides that the Hebrews tooke

C an inſtimable prey of gold, ſiluer, apparel, Camels & other horſes. But Gedeon returning into his country, Ephraim ſlue the reſt of the kings of the Madianites: naithes the tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with his happy execution, reſolued to make warre againſt him, accusing him for that he had not made them priuy of his ſtratageme intended againſt the enemy. But Gedeon being a temperate man, & endowed with all kind of vertue, gaue them this moſt anſwere, that it was not he that by his owne direction had ſet vpon the enemy, but that it was Gods onely handie worke: notwithstanding that the victorie was no leſſe theirs, then his or thoſe his followers that achieued the enterpriſe. And with theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he no leſſe profited the Hebrews thereby, then by his valiant actions, by reaſon that he deliuered them from a ciuil war, whereinto they had fallen, if his diſcretion had not prevented it. This tribe was puniſhed for this D outrage offered to ſo noble a perſonage, as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon laboring to diſmiſſe himſelfe of the government, was forced to continue the ſame, and ruled the Israelites for the ſpace of fortie yeares, doing iuſtice to euery one that required the ſame at his hands, and deciding their controuerſies (ſo irreuoicable and certaine was that eſteemed which hee had decreed.) Finally he died when he was very olde, and was buried in the country of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

How ſome of GEDDONS ſucceſſours made warre with the nations round about them.

E Gedeon had ſeuentic lawfull ſonnes begotten on diuers lawfull wiues: he had likewiſe one Hedio & Ruſtard by his concubine Druma, which hee called Abimelech, who after the deſeaſe of his father, retired himſelfe to Sichem (where his mother was borne) there (aſſiſted with money by his mothers kined, & backed by the who were men reſolute & addreſſed to al facinorous actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlue all his brethren (except Joſhan, who by good hap ſaued himſelfe by flight) now when as Abimelech had once obtained the tyranny, he ruled all things according to his luſt, and neglected the ordinances and preſcript of lawe, hating all thoſe that in any ſort were maintainers of equitie. One day therefore whileſt there was a ſolemne feaſt held at Sichem (whereunto the whole people were vſually wont to reſort) Joſhan his brother (who as we ſaid, ſaued himſelfe by flight) climbing the mountaine of Garizim, which alluſed vnderneath the Citie of Sichem, with a loud voice (which might eaſily be ouerheard by the people, and in a generall ſilence of the whole multitude) hee beſought them that they would heare him in a few words, and when as they incontinently liſtned with a greater and more reuerend ſilence; hee told them in times paſt the trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeake after the manner of men, and that (in a certaine aſſembly wherein they were to conſult of their government) they beſought the fig tree to accept the ſoueraignie ouer them, which when ſhee reſuſed, a king and pleaded in his owne behalfe that he was contented with that honour which he reaped by the means of the fruit which he bare, & sought not further. The trees surceased not to seeke an other prince, resolving with themselves to ascribe that honour to the Vine, which in as many words as „the Fig tree refused the same: and no lesse did the Olive tree: At last they preferred their humble „prostration of election to the great Bramble (whose wood is good for firing) hee answered if „you doe vnfaignedly require me for your king, repose your selues vnder my shadow; but if you in- „tend treasons against me, there shall a fire issue from mee and consume you. These things, said „than, I report vnto you not to moue you to laughter, but for that you (hauing receiued manie „benefits at the hands of Gedeon) suffer Abimelech, who in spirit differeth nothing from the fire, to „vsurpe the Princedome after the slaughter of my brethren. When he had spoken after this man- ner hee departed, and for three yeeres space liued hidden amongst the mountaines, flying the power of Abimelech. Neither did there many daies ouerpasse, but that the Sichemites (being moued with compassion and iust reuenge in respect of the murder which was committed vpon the sonnes of Gedeon) banished Abimelech out of their Citie, and the whole tribe. Whereupon hee resolved to do some mischief to both the Citie and Citizens: and for that their vintage was at hand, & they durst not gather the fruit, fearing lest they should receiue some iniury at the hands of Abimelech. By good happe about that time a certaine Prince called Gaal retired thither with a troupe of souldiours & his kinred: him did the Sichemites beseech that he would grant them a conuoy, whilst they had gathered in their haruest: which request of theirs being accepted by Gaal, they issued out with their forces, being seconded by him and his, and securely brought in their fruits, and feasting one with another in companies, they were so bold as to scoffe at Abimelech, and the chieft of his followers: and the chieft of those straungers among them that came into their city to their assistance, surprised by Ambuscado diuers of Abimelech, people and slew them. But Zebel one of the Sichemits & *Abimelech*s host signified vnto him by a messenger, how Gaal incited the people against him, inuiting him to lie in wait for him neere about the Citie, promising him that he would bring Gaal thither, to the end that hee might easily reuenge him of that iniurie which his enemy had offered him. Which done, he promised to worke so wisely that he would reconcile him to the peoples fauour againe: & when as Abimelech had chosen a place fit to lie in ambush, & Gaal with Zebel too carelessly liued and walked in the suburbs, at length hee sodainly espying certaine armed men, cried out to Zebel, that hee had discovered the enemy, whereunto Zebel replied that they were the shadowes of rocks: but Gaal drawing more neere vnto them and perceiuing apparantly who they were, answered Zebel, that they were no shadowes, but ambushes of men. Whereunto Zebel replied, Dost thou not object cowardise to Abimelech, why therefore shewest thou not thy great valour in fighting with him? Gaal confusedly amazed, assailed the souldiours of Abimelech, in which conflict certaine of his followers were slaine, and he himselfe fled into the Citie (giuing example vnto the rest to follow him). Hereupon Zebel laboured that Gaal might be expelled out of the Citie, accusing him of his cowardly encounter with the souldiours of Abimelech. Now when as the same Abimelech had afterwards gotten certaine intelligence, that the Sichemites would issue anew gather to their vintage, hee laid an ambush neere vnto the Citie. And no sooner were they issued, but that the third part of his troopes surprised and seized the gates to cut them off from their returne, that thought to reenter; the rest ranne after those that were scattered here and there: so that there was a great slaughter on euery side, and the Citie was ruined euen vnto the verie foundations (for they could not withstand the siege) and they sowed salt vpon the ruines thereof. Thus perished all they that were in the Citie of Sichem. But they that escaped thorow the country, and had auoided the danger, assembled and fortified themselves vpon a strong rocke, and there incamped and began to defence the same. But as soone as Abimelech had notice of their intention, hee hastened thither with his forces, and inuironed the place with fagots of dry wood (carying them thither in his owne person, and encouraging thereby those of his armie to doe the like) so that the rocke was incontinently compassed with wood. Whereunto hee set fire round about, & in an instant it flamed and burned vehemently, so as none of them were saved, but all of them perished with their wiues and children, to the number of fiftene hundred men, besides many other of the weaker sort. This calamitie hapned to the Sichemites (in so grieuous a measure that there is not any griefe sufficient to deplore it) were it not that that so horrible misfortune fell vpon them, by reason of their ingratitude they had shewed to so vpright a iudge, and so gracious a benefactor. Abimelech alaid the courage of the Israelites by this encounter and conquest of the Sichemites, and gaue sufficient testimonie that hee aspired more higher, and that he would neuer terminate terminate his violence vntill hee had vtterly extinguished them. Hee therefore led forth his armie against the Tibeans and their Citie, which he tooke: but in that towne there was a great tower, whither all the people had retired themselves, and whilst hee prepared himselfe to besiege the same, and approached likewise neere vnto the gates, a certaine woman cast a peece of a millstone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cause that Abimelech called at that time for his squier, commanding him to dispatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that hee died by the hands of a woman. His squier did according as hee had commanded him, and reuenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the cruelty hee had committed against his brethren, and the tyranny executed vpon the Sichemites; on whom all these misfortunes fell according as Iothan had foretold them. As soone as Abimelech was slaine, all the armie was disperied, and euery one returned vnto his dwelling place: and Iair the Galeadite of the tribe of Manasses tooke vpon him the gouernment. Amongst other conditions of this man, these were of the greatest note, that he was rich, and had thirtie worthie sonnes, all expert vpon horse backe, and exercised the magistracie in the countrey of Galaad: hee (after hee had gouerned the people for the space of twentie yeeres) died, when he was very olde, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a Citie of Galaad. From this time forward the policie and estate of the Hebrewes grew more and more disordered, and the lawes began to be neglected: Whence it came to passe that the Ammonites and Philistines (setting light by them) destroyed all their countrey with a great armie, during which time they occupied all the land on this side Iordan, and so much were they heartened, as that they pressed further, and possessed the better part on the other side of the riuer, and conquered the same. Whereupon the Hebrewes being brought to more moderation by these their aduersities, had their recourse vnto God by prayers and sacrifices, requiring him that it might please him to moderate his wrath, and that hauing regard and respect to their supplication, he would be pleased to stay his heavy hand ouer them. This submission of theirs preuailed with God, who inclined himselfe to assist them. Whilst therefore the Ammonites led their armie into Galaad, they of the countrey arose to meete and fight with them, being disurnished of a gouernour to conduct them. Now there was a certaine man called Iephtha, of great estimation, as well for the verue of his ancestors, as his owne particular valour (the rather for that he had been trained and maintained in warlike seruice.) To him they sent a messenger, requiring him that he would assist them, promising him, that he should continue in the gouernment during the terme of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their request, but reprochfully objected against them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reason he was not their brother by the same mother, but a stranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his paramour, they had driuen him out of their family, setting light by him, by reason of his base birth) yet notwithstanding hee had liued in Galaad, receiuing all those into wages which came vnto him, of what place soeuer they were. But after they had besought him, and sworne vnto him that he should continue in the gouernment, hee became their generall in warre, and speedily (providing and foreseeing what soeuer was necessary, he incamped himselfe neere vnto Maïpha, and sent Embassadors to the Ammonites, accusing them for inuading a countrey that belonged not vnto them. They contrariwise blamed the Israelites, for that they were fled like fugitiues from Egypt, and commanded that the Israelites should depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their auncient patrimonie.) Iephtha answered that they had no reason to accuse their ancestors, in respect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to giue them thanks, for that they had permitted them to enioy the countrey of Ammon, by reason it was in Moses power to haue commanded the same. In a word, they were resolved not to forsake the countrey which God had both giuen and purchased for them, and which they had held in their possession for the space of three hundred yeeres, alledging that hee would defend the same against them by dint of sword: with these words dismissed he the Embassadors of the Ammonites. Then besought he God that it might please him to grant him victorie: and hee made a vow, that if hee returned vnto his house whole and in safetie, he would offer a vp in sacrifice, that of his which he should first meete withall in his returne: whereupon encountering the enemy he defeated him, and pursued him, killing those that fled continually till he came to the Citie of Maniathen. Then entering the countrey of the Ammonites; hee destroyed diuers Cities, and led away a great prey, and deliuered and ransomed diuers slaues of that nation, who had endured that seruitude for the space of eightene yeeres. But as he returned homeward, he fell into such an inconuenient, as was no waies aueritable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eightene yeeres) came out to meete him: whereupon resolving and melting melting himselfe into teares, he began to check her for that so hastily she had issued forth to meet him, by reason he had consecrated the first thing hee met withall to God. But this accident was no waies displeasing vnto the Damzell, but that she willingly died; both for the victory of her father, and the deliuerance of her brethren: shee therefore be sought her father that it would please him to grant her two moneths before shee should be sacrificed, to the end she might lament her youth with her companions: and that after that terme, her father might acquit himselfe of that vowe which hee had made. Ieptha granted her the terme and time she had limited, which being expired, hee sacrificed his daughter for a burnt offering: which oblation of his was neither comforted to the law, nor agreeable vnto God (by reason he examined not in his vnderstanding before he committed the act, how it would be taken by those that should heare the report thereof.)

The tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would haue sent out men of warre against him (by reason hee had not communicated his enterprise against the Ammonites with them, but had onely reserved the prey, and vsurped the honour of the execution to himselfe) whereunto he answered first of all, that being of his kinred, they could not be ignorant that both hee and his were assailed by warre; and had besides that also bene required to giue them their assistance, whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Secondly, he told them that that which they vnderooke was both vnlawfull and most wicked, in that not daring to confront or assaile the enemy, they made no bones to set vpon and assault their owne brothers and familiars, threatening them that if they gouerned not themselves, he would (by the assistance of God) be reuenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected & despised, so that he was forced to arme himselfe against them, and with an host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preventing their passage who fled vnto Iordan: and the number of those that were slaine amounted to fortie thousand or thereabouts. But after that Ieptha had gouerned fixe yeares he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was borne, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his decease, Aslan tooke vpon him the gouernment. He was of the tribe of Iuda, of the citie of Bethleem, and had sixtie children, thirtie males and thirtie females, which he left all aliue and married: he died when hee was very old, without performing any thing worthie either recitall or memorie, during the space of his seuen yeers gouernment: he was buried in his countrey. Elon a Zabulonite his successor dis- fered nothing from him in the same, and during the terme of ten yeeres wheroin he gouerned, he achieued nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the sonne of Elon (of the tribe of Ephraim of the Citie of Pharathon) was declared soueraigne Iudge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicitie in his children (by reason that the estate was in peace and securitie, and that hee exploited nothing worthy glory) hee had fortie sonnes, who had thirtie other children, and hee rode accompanied with thirtie seuentie, who were all of them expert on horsebacke. Hee left them all aliue, and died when he was very old, and was magnifically buried in Pharathon.

After his death, the Philistines had the vpper hand ouer the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of fortie yeares. From that misery were they ransomed after this manner: Manoach (an excellent man, and one of the chiefe of the tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely esteemed Prince amongst them) had a wife most famous for her beautie, and excellent amongst all other of that time; yet had hee no children by her; whereat he was very sore displeased: and for this cause he made his continuall prayers vnto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farme) beseeching him that it might please his maiestic, to graunt him some lawfull heire and successour (now the place whither they resorted was situate in a broad Plaine.) Furthermore he loued his wife so exceedingly, that hee almost doted on her, and for this occasion he was extremely ielous of her. Whilest thus the woman liued solitarily by her selfe, an Angell of God appeared vnto her in a vision, promising her a goodly, faire and puissant sonne, who denounced vnto her the pleasant message of the birth of her child, which God by his prouidence would bestow vpon her, who should be goodly and admirable in his forces, and vnder whom also (as soone as he should attaine to mans estate) the Philistines should endure many ouerthrowes: exhorting her not to cut his haire, commanding likewise

As soone as her husband returned home againe, she told him all that which the Angell had said vnto her, who was amazed at the beauty and greatnesse of the young messenger, who appeared vnto her after so strange a manner, as Manoach was almost spent with ielousie and suspition (which such a passion is wont to engender.) But shee desirous to mitigate his discontent, and that distrust which he had vainely and vnadvisedly conceiued; besought God that it might please him once more to send his Angell vnto her, to the intent that her husband might see him. Whilest therefore they liued in this sort out of towne, the Angell presented himselfe againe (thorow the grace of God) and appeared vnto the woman (being apart from her husband.) But she besought him to abide vntill such time as she had called her husband: which when she had obtained, she wrote and fetcht Manoach, who notwithstanding was not deliuered of his suspition: but required him that he would relate againe vnto him all that which he had signified to his wife. The Angell answered him, that it sufficed that she only knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his sonne should bee borne, hee might both giue him presents, and present him thanks. The Angell answered, that he had no need thereof, by reason that he had not brought that good newes of the birth of his sonne for any necessity that he had: Manoach besought him to stay and receiue some token of kindnesse: but he would not consent. Finally, being instantly pressed to abide and receiue some gift: Manoach killed a kid, and commaunded his wife to roste the same. And when as all things were in readinesse, the Angell commaunded them to lay the bread and flesh vpon a rock without dishes: which being done, he touched the flesh with a wand which he bare in his hand, and sodainly a flaming fire consumed both the bread, and flesh; and the Angell was seene to ascend vp into heauen in the smoake as it were in a chariot. Manoach was affraid least some inconuenient should happen vnto him, by reason that they had in that sort seen God: but his wife recomfirmed him, by reason that God had appeared vnto them for their profit sake. Anon after she became big with childe, and obserued all that which had been commaunded her, and when the infant was borne he called his name Sampson (which is as much to say, as strong) who presently endowed with an excellent beauty both of mind and body, vsing his haire vnshorne, and sobriety in his diet, he seemed to make shew in himselfe of some propheticall and more then humane forwardnesse.

that he would take it for a certaine signe that he hated her: that at last he told her what had hapned with the Lion which he had slaine, and how in him hee had the three hony combes which hee brought vnto her: and (suspectlesse of either fraud or guile) he deciphered the whole storie vnto her, and the afterwards reported the same to those that had besought her in that behalfe. When as therefore the seuenth day was come wherein the question was to bee decided, they assembled themselues together about sunne set, and said: There is nothing more irksome to meeete withall then a Lyon, neither any thing more pleasant to taste, then hony: Whereunto Sampson replied, that there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for shee it is that hath reported say words vnto you. Notwithstanding all this, he deliuered that which he had promised them out of that bootie, which he had taken from certaine Alcalonites, whom he encountered vpon the way. From that time forward hee forsooke this marriage, and the woman (the more to despise him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalfe first solicited the marriage. Sampson (being the more incensed by this iniurie) resolved to reuenge himselfe both on her, and the whole nation: For which cause in the sommer season (when the corne was ready to be reape) hee tooke three hundred foxes, to whose tayles he fastned flaming torches, and droue them into the Philistines fields of corne, consuming by this means all their haruest hope. The Philistines vnderstanding that Sampson had done this, and conceiuing the reason that induced him to execute this action, sent their garrison to Thamna, and burnt this woman aliuie with all her kindred, as the authors of that losse that had hapned vnto them. After that Sampson had slaine diuers Philistines in the countrey, he went and dwelt at Etam (which is a strong rocke in the tribe of Iuda.) For which cause the Philistines assailed that tribe, who certified them that there was no reason why they should suffer for those offences which were committed by Sampson, and that in especiall, because they paid them tribute. The Philistines replied, that except they would not be maintainers of this act of iniustice, they should deliuer Sampson vnto them. They therefore (desirous that the Philistines should haue no cause of quarrell against them) came vnto the rocke to the number of three thousand men, or therabouts, and blamed Sampson for those actions which hee desired to commit against the Philistines (a people that might endanger all the nation of the Hebrewes) alleaging further that they came to the end to take, surprise and deliuer him into the Philistines hands, praying him to submit himselfe voluntary to that their resolution. Sampson made them sweare that they would doe him no further iniury, but deliuer him onely vnto their enemies, and that done he descended from the rocke, surrendering himselfe to the hands of those of Iuda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliuer him to the Philistines. Now being arrived in a certaine place, which before that time had no name, and at this present is called the Maxilla, that is to say a iawe (by reason of the valour which Sampson shewed in that place) and approaching neere the Philistines campe; shouting and reioicing in their presence, by reason that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them) Sampson brake his bonds, and catching vp the iawe of an Asse which hee found at his feete, and marching forth against the Philistines, he slewe and beate downe to the number almost of two thousand of them, putting all the rest to flight and confusion. Sampson (becoming more elate after this execution then he ought to haue been, and confessing not that it was done by the assistance of God, but attributing the same to his owne vertue) gloried, that with the iawe of an Asse hee had partly slaine, and partly constrained the enemies both to feare and flie. But being seiled with an exceeding thirst, hee acknowledged and confessed that mans force is of no force, and protested that all ought to be ascribed to God, whom he besought that he would not be displeased with that which he had spoken, but that it might be remitted, and himselfe deliuered from the present danger. Whereupon God heard his prayers, and caused a pleasant and abundant fountaine to issue and spring from the soote of a rocke: for which cause Sampson called the place Maxilla or Iaw, which name continueth euen vnto this day. After this battaile Sampson set light by the Philistines, and went to Gaza where he sojourned in an Inne. The gouernours of the Citie vnderstanding of his arrivall, set men to keepe the gates, to the end hee might not depart without their knowledge. But Sampson (being no waies ignorant of that which they intended against him) arose about midnight and caried away the gates, with the hinges and lockes and all the furniture of the same, and laying them on his shoulders, caried and cast them on the mountaine Hebron. Not long after that hee transgressed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domestical manner of liuing, conforming himselfe to the fashions of the Gentiles, which was the source and offspring of all his ruine. For he was surprised and intangled with the loue of one that was called Dalila (which was a common strumpet amongst the Philistines.) To her resorted the gouernours of the

A Philistines, and by promises wrought so much with her, that they wrought her to worke out of him wherein his force consisted, & what the cause was that he might not be apprehended by his enemies. She (conversing with him in drinking and keeping him company) tolde him that she maruailed at his actions, and by subtil insinuations practiced to vnderstand the manner and cause that made him so excellent in vertue. But Sampson (that as yet was subtil, staid and well gouerned) in countercheck of her craft answered her: that if he were tyed with seuen vine branches that were young and pliant, hee should become the most feeblest amongst men. Whereupon for that time she contented her selfe; and hauing giuen notice thereof to the gouernours of the Philistines, she had in her house certaine men of warre: then when he was drunke and asleepe, she bound him as strongly fast as might be possible; and sodainly waking him tolde him that certaine soldiers were at hand to assaile him: but Sampson brake the bonds of the vine branches, and addressed himselfe to repulse the assaults of those that lay in waight to offend him. The woman, frustrate of that hope which she expected, not long time after that (getting a fit opportunitie, in that Sampson conuersed continually) began grieuouly to complaine against him, for that distrusting her loue and constancie, hee had concealed that from her which thee most of all desired to know, as if she had been insufficient to conceale that which might any waies concerne the fortune and safety of her beloued: But he deceiued her the second time, and saide vnto her, that if he were tyed with seuen cordes, he should lose his force. Which when shee had done, and found a contrary issue to her expectation, the third time Sampson tolde her, that if she pleighted his haire with a fillet, he should be weakned: and hauing experimented that also, shee found that it was false. Finally (for that a great misfortune attended vpon him) shee besought him so much, that at last hee condescended to gratifie her, and spake to her after this manner. God hath care ouer mee, and I am by his especiall providence bred and brought vp: for this cause I nourish this haire, for that God hath commanded me not to cut the same, because my force shal endure and augment as long as these lockes shall endure and grow. Which when shee vnderstood, she shaued off his haire and betraied him to his enemies, whose forces at that time he was too feeble to resist, who plucked out his eies, and led him away bound: but in space of time his haire grewe againe, and at such time as the Philistines celebrated a publike feast (wherin the Princes and Peeres banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a house, the couer whereof was sustained with two pillars) Sampson was sent for, and brought to the feast, to the end they might mocke at him in the midst of their feasts and drunkenesse. But he taking it more grieuouly then all other the euils which hee indured, that he might not reuenge himselfe on those that thus iniuriouly did iniure him: hee wrought so much with the boy that led him, that he approached and tooke hold of the foresaid pillars, telling him that he had great neede to repose himselfe, considering the trauell that he had sustained. As soone therefore as hee got holde on them, he shooke them in such a sort, as they were ouerturned, and the house fell vpon those that were therein, who died to the number of three thousand men, with these also died Sampson, who finished his daies in this sort, after he had commanded ouer Israel for the space of twenty yeares. He was a man of great vertue, force and magnanimitie: and especially in that which concerneth his end, he merith to be admired at, because that euen vnto his latter houre he was animated against the Philistines. And whereas he was allured and besotted by a woman, it ought to be attributed to humane nature, which is so weake that it cannot resist sinne: otherwise in all other things, we ought to yeeld testimony of his vertue. His kinsfolke tooke his body and buried it in Sarasa his country, by his parents.

How the sonnes of ELI the high Priest were slaine in battell by the Palestines.

F After the decease of Sampson, Eli the high Priest tooke vpon him the gouernment ouer the Israelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech vnable to endure the miserie thereof, came from Bethleem a Citie of the tribe of Iuda to inhabite in the country of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife, and Chelion and Maalon his sons, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate successe as might be desired, he married his sonnes to certaine daughters of the Moabites, Chelion vnto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten yeares after, Elimelech and his sonnes dyed, the one after the other. By which mishappe Naomi being cast into great sorrowe and destitute of their companie, whose deare familiaritie she had preferred before the loue of her country: changing her resolution

(according to those occurrences that had happened her) shee determined to returne vnto her friends, by reason she had receiued intelligence that her countrey at that time was in good estate. But her daughters in law could no waies endure to be separated from her, and will shee still shee, they would needs accompany her: but shee wishing them a more happy mariage then that which they enioyed with her sonnes, and in all other things prosperitie, and protesting vnto them that there was no ability in her to doe them good; shee besought them that they would stay in that place, and not (desiring to follow their wretched mother in lawe in an vncertaine estate) to lose the certaine pleasure and peaceable fruition of their countrey. These her perswasions tooke effect with Orpha: but Ruth (resolued in no sort to forsake her) attended on her mother in law (as an assured and future companion of whatsoeuer fortune should fall vpon her.) Now when as both of them were arrived in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinsman) entertained them in his house: and whereas the Citizens called her by the name of Naomis, she said vnto them, that it was more seemely for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue signifieth good hap, and Mara is as much to say as bitterness.) Whereas then it was harvest time, Ruth by the permission of her mother, went out into the fields to glean, and gather corne for her sustenance: and it fortuned that she met by good hap in the fields with Boos, who came thither likewise not long after; who beholding her, inquired and questioned with the chiefe reaper as touching the woman. Now had he a little before that time vnderstood by her, her whole estate; which he declared vnto his master, who gaue her thanks for the good affection which she bare vnto her mother in lawe, and of the care she had of her deceased sonne, whom Ruth had married, wishing her in effect all good fortune: and not suffering her to gleane, he permitted her to reape and to gather all that which the might, commanding his master-reaper that hee should no waies let her from taking whatsoeuer she pleased: giuing order likewise that when the reapers should take their refection, they should giue her both meate and drinke. Now when as Ruth had receiued graine at their hands, shee refused it for her mother in lawe, and came home at night and brought her the sheaves. In like manner Naomi had reserved a portion of certaine victualls for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had sent her. Vpon her returne Ruth reported vnto her all those words that Boos had said vnto her: and Naomi gaue her to vnderstand that Boos was of her kin, & that it might be that he was moued by deuotion towards God to haue care of her. Some other daies after, Ruth issued againe with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings. And certaine daies after (and about that time that they threshed barley) Boos came and slept on the floore: which K when Naomi vnderstood, shee bethought her selfe of some subtil practice, whereby shee might make Ruth lie with him (presuming that it would be a very good fortune for the young woman if they might growe in acquaintance together) for which cause she sent her to sleepe at his feete. Ruth (that made it a conscience to contradict her mother in lawe in whatsoeuer shee commaunded her) repaired thither, and vpon her first arriuall Boos perceiued nothing (because he was fast asleepe:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was some body that lay fast by him, hee demanded what she was: whereupon shee told him her name; requesting him as her master, that he would permit her to repose in that place for that time. But early in the morning before the seruants began to fall to their worke, hee commaunded her to arise, and to take as much barley with her as she could beare, to the end the might returne vnto her mother in lawe, before that any man might perceiue that shee had slept in that place (because it is wisdom to auoide slander, especially at such time when there is occasion offered for a man to speake ill.) Touching the rest (sayd he) the matter standeth thus: Thou hast a kinsman (sayd hee) that is more neere thee in blood then I am; thou must enquire of him, if it be his pleasure to take thee to his wife: and if he saith that he liketh thee, thou then must necessarily submit vnto him: but if hee refuse thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the lawe intendeth. Now when shee had reported these newes vnto her mother in lawe, shee gathered courage and conceived hope that Boos would take care of her. Therupon Boos came into the City about noone-daies, and called a counsell of the elders, and sent for Ruth and his kinsman, to whome in person hee spake thus: Dost thou possesse the heritage of Abimelech and his successors? Who when he had publicly declared that he was seised thereof in right of proximity, according to the ordinance of the lawe: Boos replied. Thou must not (saith he) onely obserue the lawes in part; but thou must precisely execute them according as they are. For, behold here a young woman, whom it behooueth thee to marry according to the lawe, if thou wilt be inheritor of his possessions. But hee surrendred vnto Boos, not onely the possessions, but also the woman; by reason that Boos was allied also to those that were dead, and especially for that the said kinsman had already both wife & children.

Boos

A Boos therefore (knowing first of all taken witness of all the counsell) called for the woman, and quilled her to draw neere vnto her kinsman, and to vnloose his shoe, and strike him on the face (according as the lawe had ordained) which done, Boos espoused Ruth, by whom (about a yeare after) shee had a sonne, which Naomi brought vp; and by the aduice of the women shee called his name Obed (because shee had nourished him in her age: for Obed in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a thing by Obed begate Iesse, and Iesse begate Dauid, who was king, and whoso leste the seede to his successors for one and twentie generations of men. I haue bene enforced to declare these things as touching Ruth, because I haue an intent to declare the power of God, by whome it is possible to rayle men from obscuritie to the highest tippe and title of dignitie, as hee hath chosen Dauid, who descended from these of whome I haue spoken.

B The affaires of the Hebrewes were at this time in very poore estate; and they armed themselves anew against the Philistines vpon this occasion. The high Priest Eli had two sonnes, Ophni and Phinees. They against all right and law (offering outrages to men; and vrging impieties against God) suffered no sinne to ouerslip them which they committed not: for they tooke presents (partly in way of honour, partly raiused by force and rapine.) And as touching those women that came vnto the Tabernacle in way of deuotion, they abused them, and raiusing some against their wils, and corrupting some other by presents; they so lewdly liued, that their life seemed to be a true and licentious tyranny: for this cause their father was sore displeased with them, but the people were so much the more ouerbardened with griefe, because as yet they perceiued not that Gods punishment should so sodainly fall vpon them. But incontinently after that God had declared to Eli and the Prophet Samuel (who about that time was very young) what mishap should fall vpon Eli's children, hee mourned ouer them, as if they had been already dead. (But I wil first of all declare somewhat vnto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards wil I speake of the children of Eli, & what inconuenient fell vpon all the Hebrew nation.) Elcana was a Leuite of base condition, living in Ramatha a part of Ephraim: he had married two wiues, the one called Anna, the other Phenanna: by Phenanna he had children; yet notwithstanding loued hee Anna very intirely, although shee were barren. Now as Elcana with his wiues repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was resident (as we haue before declared) to the intent to offer sacrifice in that place: whilst I say, during the festiuall he distributed the portion of his meat to his wiues and children. Anna (beholding the children of his other wife sitting round about their mother) began to weep and lament with her selfe, because she was without issue and alone. And after that by her griefe shee had overcome all that consolation which her husband could giue her, she went vnto the Tabernacle to beseech God that it might please him to giue her a sonne, and make her a mother; promising that her first begotten sonne should be dedicated vnto the seruice of God; and should lead a particular life farre differing from that of other liuing men. And for that she employed long time in making her prayers, the high Priest Eli; who sate before the Tabernacle, commaunded her to depart from thence, supposing that shee had tasted too much wine: but after that shee had tolde him that shee drunk nothing but water, and that (being oppressed with griefe) shee was come into the Tabernacle to beseech God that it might please him to graunt her children; hee exhorted her to be of good courage, promising that God had heard her prayers: whereupon shee returned to her husband replenished with good hope, and took her repast with ioy and gladnes. When as then they returned to their owne house, she began to wax bigge with childe, and at last she bare a little young sonne, whom shee called Samuel (that is to say, Requested at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer sacrifice and giue thanks vnto God for the birth of the child, which God had giuen them, and to bring their tenths; wherupon the woman (remembering her of the vow shee had made in his behalfe) deliuered him into the hands of Eli; and consecrated him vnto God to bee his Prophet. For which cause they suffered his haire to growe, and hee dranke nothing but water, and Samuel was nourished and brought vp in the Temple: Elcana had by Anna other sonnes and three daughters. But as touching Samuel (incontinently after he attained to the age of twelue yeares) he prophesied. On a certaine night therefore whilst he slept, God called him by his name: and he supposing that the high Priest had wakened him, came vnto him: but he told him that he had not called him. This notwithstanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being sore amazed, he said vnto him, Samuel, I neither now at this present, nor before this time haue spokē vnto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, answere him therefore, and say here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more; and he required him that it might please him to speake, and he would answere, not failling any waies to doe him seruice in that wherein he should command him. Wherunto God G answered saying: Since (saith he) thou art here, know that so great a calamity shall fall vpon the Israelites, that there is not any tongue that may expresse the same, or man that may belieue it. The sonnes of Eli shall die, and the Priesthood shall be transported into the family of Eleazar: For, Eli hath more loued his children then my seruice, and more then was expedient for them. Eli enforced the Prophet by imprecations to declare vnto him that, which he had heard. But Samuel (for feare he should discomfort him) would not disclose the same vnto him, which made him the more assured of the intended and imminent death of his sonnes. And because that which Samuel prophesied in effect proued true, his reputation increased dayly more and more.

In that time the Philistines (leading out their armie against the Israelites) incamped neere H vnto the City of Ampec, and for that the Hebrewes were negligent to withstand them, they passed further into the countries therabout: so that in fighting with their enemies, the Philistines at last got the vpper hand, and slew the Hebrewes, and had them in chace for the space of foure miles, pursuing the rest of those that fled euen vnto their owne rents. Wherupon the Hebrewes grew ielous and affraid of their whole estate: and therefore sent they to the counsell of the Elders and the high Priest, praying them to bring the Arke of God with them, to the end that (hauing it in presence with them) they might strike the battell and ouercome their enemies. But they bethoght them not, that he that had pronounced the sentence of their calamitie against the, was greater then the Arke which was made for him. The Ark then was brought, and the sonnes of Eli attended it, whom their father had expressly commanded, that if it so fell out that the Arke I were taken, they should neuer more come before his presence, except they would die. Now Phinees executed the office of the high Priest, by the permission of his father, by reason he was very aged.

The Hebrewes (because of the presence of the Arke) conceived very great hope and assurance, that they should haue the vpper hand of their enemies. The Philistines likewise were sore amazed, fearing the presence of the same: but the issues were not answerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they ioyned battell, the victory which the Hebrewes hoped should be theirs, fel vnto the Philistines; & the losse which the Philistines feared, fel vpon the Hebrewes, who at last perceived that they had reposed their confidence on the Arke all in vaine. For as soone as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned their backs, and lost about thirty thousand men, amongst whom the sonnes of the high Priest were slaine, and the Arke was taken and carried away by the enemy.

Eli vnderstanding of the losse of his sonnes, fell from his seate and dyed.

AS soone as the newes of this ouerthrow was brought into Silo, and that it was certainly knowne that the Arke was taken (for a young Beniamite, who was at the execution, L was come to bring tidings thereof) all the Citie was filled with sorrow: and Eli the high Priest (who sat in one of the gates on a high throne) vnderstanding the lamentation, and iudging that some disaster had befallen his people; sent to seeke out this young messenger, by whom hee was aduertised of that which had hapned. This accident of his sonnes and the army he bare with great moderation, because that before that time he had vnderstood by God what should happen (for those aduersities which are least suspected do more grievously oppress vs, at such time as they happen:) But when he knew that the Arke was surprisid, and in the enemies hands, by reason that it hapned beyond his expectation, he was in such sort attainted with griefe, that he suffered himselfe to fall from his throne vpon the ground, where he died: he liued ninety and eight yeares in all, and had spent forty of them in the government of the people.

The same day died the wife of Phinees the sonne of Eli, who had no more power to liue when she vnderstood of the misfortune of her husband: for she was with child at such time as the message of this his death was brought vnto her, and she brought forth a sonne in the seauenth month, which liued and was called Ichabod (which signifieth ignominie) by reason of the infamy receiued at that time by the army.

Eli was the first that gouerned among the successors of Ishamar, one of the sonnes of Aaron: for

A for before that time the house of Eleazar was possessed of the Priesthood (the sonne receiuing it from his father) Eli transferred it to Phinees, after him Abiezar his sonne occupied the place, & left it to his sonne Bori, whose sonne called Ozai receiued it, after whom Eli (of whom we speake at this present) tooke the same, whose posteritie remained that dignitie till the time of the raigne of Salomon: for at that time the posteritie of Eleazar were reinstalled.

CHAP. I.

How the Palestines compelled by pestilence and famine, sent backe the Arke of conemant vnto the Hebrewes.

After that the Philistines had gotten the victorie ouer the Hebrewes, and taken the sacred Arke (as we haue before this declared) they brought it with other their spoiles vnto the Citie of Azot, and placed it in manner of a trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idoll. But on the next day after (when ereely in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their God) they found him fallen from that base or pillar that sustained him, and lay along vpon the ground, his face vpward before the Arke; whereat being moued, they tooke and fastned him in his former place: and when as they came verie oftentimes thither, and alwaies found him prostrate, and adoring before the Arke, a great feare and perturbation inuaded the whole people. At length a grievous plague, not onely raunged in the Citie of Azot, but also seized on all the inhabitants of the country. For the people being sodainly taken with the flixe, died in great torment, and some of them vomited vp their bowels, being corrupted and corroded with the disease. Besides this, the whole land swarmed with mice, who destroying all things, neither spared the corne, nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus oppressed with these calamities, & viable any longer to indure the same, vnderstood that the Arke was

was the cause thereof, and that neither the victorie, neither the surprisall of the same, had any G waies procured either their good or profit. They therefore sent vnto the Ascalonites, requiring them that they would receive the Arke into their Citie, who (willingly condescending to their embassage and demand) received the Arke, and were presently plagued with the same sicknesses and mishaps which the Azotians had suffered. For together with the Arke, the calamities also were translated, for which cause it was likewise sent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while; for the inhabitants of that place being afflicted by the same grievances which the other endured, sent it to their neighbour Cities, so that after this sort the Arke was conuayed to five Cities of the Palestines: (exacting as it were by those plagues a tribute in euerie one of them of violated religion) who wearied with so many evils, and made examples vnto others not to entertaine the Arke, which so grievously recompensed those that required the same; perceived that there was no other waie left them but to finde out some good meanes to rid themselves of the same. When as therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Ascalon, Gaza, and Azot, were assembled, they consulted amongst themselves what were best to be done, and first of all they resolved to send backe the Arke vnto those to whom it appertained, whoe captiuitie God did reuenge in that with it many plagues entred into the same Region, and ceased not to waste both their men and their countrey. There were some that said that this resolution was vnseemly to be executed, denying that these things should be imputed to the captiuitie of the Arke (whose power if it were so great as they intended, or if God had any waies care of the same; hee would neuer haue permitted it to haue fallen into the hands of men of a contrarie religion) perswading them to digest these misfortunes with an equall mind, and so to thinke that all these things were nothing else but the effects of nature, which in certaine periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants (and in other things subiect to her power) these kinds of alterations and mutations. But the counsell of those men, that had approved their vnderstanding and wisdom in times past, was preferred before their opinion. For the assistants supposed that in this deliberation, as also their opinion and counsell was most conuenient. They therefore aduised that the Arke should be sent backe and not retained, and that the five Cities should dedicate five golden statues in testimonie of their gratitude, because they had bene preserued by his fauour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impossible to escape: they annexed also so many golden mice vnto them; like vnto those that spoiled their countrey. All these locked in a chest and laid vpon the Arke, they K commanded that a new Cart should be built, and that they should yoke and tie to the same certaine kine that had new calued, locking vp their calues from them, least they should be an impediment to their dammes, & (to the intent that thorow the desire to see their young) they should haste the faster. That done, that driving the chariot and them, they should leaue them in a place that had three waies, and suffer them to draw that way that them listeth: and if they tooke the way of the Hebrews, and should trauell towards their countrey, they then should assure themselves that it was the Arke which was the cause of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (said they) be driuen backe againe, being most assured that the Arke hath no such vertue in it. This counsell was approved by euery one of the assembly, and presently effected: so hauing prepared all those things whereof we haue spoken, they brought the chariot into a high way L that extended three waies, and leauing it in that place they returned backe againe.

A the statues of gold and golden rats were) they laid them vpon a certaine rocke in the field, and after they had solemnly sacrificed and royally feasted together, they offered vp both the chariot and kine for a burnt offering vnto God: Which when the Princes of the Palestines perceiued, they returned backe againe into their owne countrey. But Gods indignation and displeasure was whetted against the Bethsanaites: so that leuentic of them were slain, by reason they had touched the Arke, & with prophane hands (not being Priests) attempted to sustaine it. For which cause the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their losse, and mourned for that their countymen were extinguished by no fatall death, but by a punishment and plague sent from God, lamenting in particular euerie one of their alliance. And supposing that they were vnworthy that the Arke should remaine with them, they sent messengers to the gouernours and the rest of the Hebrewes, to let them vnderstand that they had recovered the Arke out of the hands of the Philistines; who being made priue to euerie accident, placed the same in Cariathiarim a Citie bordering vpon the Bethsanaites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Leuites called Aminadab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life), to his house directed they the Arke, as to a place agreeable vnto God, because there dwelled in the same a man of so much vertue. His sonnes had the charge of the Arke, and continued in that seruice for the space of twenty yeares, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had onely remained 4. moneths with the Philistines. During the time that the Arke was in the Citie of Cariathiarim, all the people conuerted themselves vnto God with prayers and sacrifices, shewing great deuotion and forwardnesse in his seruice. The Prophet C Samuel perceiuing this their readines in courage, and supposing hee had got a fit occasion to exhort them vnto libertie, and those profits which consequently follow the same; and applying his speech vnto the opportunitie, time, & affaires, spake vnto the such words as founded to this effect. Yee men of Israel, since at this present the Philistines cease not to molest you, and God beginneth to shew himselfe merciful and fauourable vnto you: it behooueth you, not only to be touched with a desire to recover your liberty, but also to endeavour your selues to purchase the same in effect. Beware therefore least thorow your owne manners you make your selues vnworthy thereof, and let each one of you endeavour to follow iustice, and expelling all sinne out of your mindes, conuert your selues in all puritie vnto God, and perseuere constantly in his seruice. For in doing these things, you shall shortly obtaine all felicitie, and especially purchase vnto your selues a new libertie, and an assured victorie against your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the strength of your bodies, neither by the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtaine: for God hath not proposed rewards for these things, but for vertue and iustice; who (trust me) will not deceiue your expectation, nor faile in the execution of his promises. When hee had spoken after this manner, all the people testified their consent in good words, shewing the pleasure they had conceiued by his discourse; promising together that which should be well liking and agreeable vnto God. Whereupon Samuel assembled them the second time in the citie of Maspha (which word signifieth conspicuous) there erected they an altar and sacrificed vnto God, and after they had fasted for a daies space, they publicly addressed them to call vpon the name of God. The Philistines in the mean space, who were assembled together in the same place, E had an inkling of that which the Hebrewes did, and being certified of this assembly came with a great multitude and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrewes, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This sodaine attempt of theirs fore dismaied and troubled the Hebrewes: and saits of so that they repairing and running vnto Samuel, told him that their hearts failed them thorow feare, and their minds were troubled thorow the remembrance of those precedent losses which they had received: For which cause they ought to hold themselves in quiet, for feare least the enemy should enforce his power against them. Whilest (said they) thou hast led vs hither to pray, sacrifice, & offer vp our vowes vnto God, they are encamped neer vnto vs, being ready to surpris vs that are naked and disarmed: we haue no other hope therefore of our securitie, but that proceed from thee and God; who being moued by thy prayer, may giue vs meanes to escape from their hands. Samuel in way of answer wised them to be of good cheere, promising them that God would yeeld them some testimonie of his assistance; whereupon sacrificing a sucking kid for the people, he besought God that it might please him to stretch forth his right hand for them in this battell against the Philistines, and that he would not permit them to fall this second time into the enemies hands. To these prayers of his, God listened with intencie cares, and accepted their humble hearts and durifull obseruance, smiling vpon their offering, and promising them both force, and victorie. But before the sacrifice was wholly consumed with flame, and the ceremonies remories performed; the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites sight, supposing that the day was alreadie theirs, in that they had intercepted the Iewes who were vnprepared for the fight (who were not onely disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they beene foretold the same, they had scarcely beleueed it.) For first of all by Gods commaundement the earth trembled vnder their feete, and with vncertaine pace they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were sodainly swallowed vp by the earthquake: at length astonished by often flashes, and hauing both their eyes and hands halfe blasted and burned by the fierie lightnings that fell (so that they could not wield nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismayed, sodainly set vpon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as farre as a place called Corraus, where hee fixed and erected a stone or trophée, as a mark both of his owne victorie, and the enemies flight, and called the same the strong rocke; as a witnesse of the force that God had giuen him against the Philistines: who after they had receiued this ouerthrow, sallied not out any more against the Israelites. But remembring themselves of their feare and those accidents that fell vpon them, they remained in peace, offering no further inuasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceiued and gotten against the Hebrewes, translated it selfe and remained with the Hebrewes euer after this victorie. And Samuel led forth his armie against them, and slew a great number of them, and for euer abased their pride, taking from them that country which before times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Iewes, which country extendeth it selfe from the frontire of Geth, to the Citie of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

Samuel prescribeth lawes and disposeth the kingdom feat in seuerall cities.

Hedio & Rufinus. cha. 3. 1. King. 8. Samuel committeth the government & care of the commonweale to his two sons Ioel and Abia.

Now when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good forme of government, he assigned them a Citie whither they might appeale, and decide those differents that might fall out amongst them: and as touching himselfe, hee tra-uailed twice euerie year from citie to citie, to administer iustice vnto them, and continued the maintenance of this policie for a long time. But as soone as hee perceiued himselfe to be ouerburdened with yeares, and vnapt to execute his ordinary offices, he referred the government and superintendence of the people to his sonnes, the elder of whom was called Ioel and the yonger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seate of iustice in Bethel, and that the other should giue audience at Bersabe, diuiding the people, and attributing each part to his particular fudge. In these was there a manifest example and infallible testimonie, that children are not alwaies borne like vnto their fathers: but that sometimes of euill parents there are good children bred, as contrariwise at that time of a good father there were euill sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father, they followed a quite contrarie course; and oppressed iustice thorow corruptions and rewards; and, swallowed vp and surfeited in delights and pleasures, they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should study to liue well, and vprightly.

CHAP. IIII.

How the people being displeased with the manners and government of the sonnes of SAMUEL demanded a King.

The Israelites report vnto Samuel the lewd behaviour of his sons, and beseech him to nominate a king that may reigne ouer them.

When as therefore the people perceiued, that the sonnes of the Prophet had committed so many outrages against their lawes and policie, they were verie sore displeased; and had recourse vnto their father where hee dwelled in the Citie of Ramatha; where reckoning vp vnto him the misdeameanors of his sonnes, and how thorow the multitude of his yeares, hee was vnfit according to his accustomed manner to administer the affaires of the common weale, they earnestly intreated and besought him, that hee would nominate and elect some King ouer them, who might both command their nation and Empire, and exact due punishment

ment on the Palestines; for their many and too oftentimes offered iniuries. This resolution of the people grievously tormented Samuels minde, who by reason of his innated and vpright iustice misliked of the kingly authoritie, as a stile and state too imperious: for he greatly delighted himselfe in the Aristocracie or government of the elders, deeming no estate more conduible, or available for the securitie and prosperitie of the people, then that was. And so did this matter distemper and distract this man, as by reason of his care he could neither tast food, nor entertaine sleep: but all the night long tossed and tumbled in his bed, during those times complotting and imagining many things in his mind. Whilest these his indispositions continued, God appeared vnto him and comforted him, willing him not to bee aggrieved at that which the people had required: but that he should suppose that this iniurie, not onely concerned him, but God himselfe, whom they disclaimed also for their king and sole gouernour ouer them. The effect whereof they had complotted, from the day that they departed out of Aegypt: but ere it be long (said he) they shall repent themselves, yet shall not their repentance vndoe that which shall be done; and it shall appeare by those counsailes they haue taken, that they haue bin contemners & ingratefull toward me by their owne confession, and towards thee also which hast bene their Prophet. I will therefore that thou choole them a king, and such a one as I shal nominate vnto thee, after thou hast aduertised them what euils they shall endure (at such time as they shall haue a King) & hast publickly declared vnto them, what inconuenients follow the change which so vehemently and vnpolitely they pursue. When Samuel vnderstood these sayings, he assembled the people about the break of day, and protested publickly vnto them, that he would establish them a King. But saith hee, before I shall effect that which you request, I must expose and declare vnto you what estate you shall liue in, being vnder the subiection of royaltie; and how many and grievous euils you shall be oppressed withall, by those Kings that shall gouerne you. Know therefore first of all, that they will take your children from you, & make some of them coachmen, & other some their horsemen and archers of their guard, others their posts and tribunes and centurions; some likewise their handicraftsmen, and armorers, and charior-makers, and smiths, and forgers of other sorts of weapons, besides husbandmen of his fields, and plowes, and diggers of his vineyards: neither is there any thing which they shal not be compelled to do after the maner of bondslaves, that are bought with money. They shall take your daughters also, and make them their perfumers, cooks and bakers; & they shall employ them in all seruile offices, whereunto their chambermaides are to be imployed either by stripes or torture. They shall take from you your substance, & giue it to their Eunuchs, and guard. They shall take your flocks, and distribute them amongst their seruants: In a word, you & all yours shall serue one king, and shal be of no better reckoning then the slaves of his household. When you shall endure these paines, then shall you call to remembrance all these things which I haue told you, and with repentance you shall beseech God, that he will haue mercie vpon you, and giue you a speedy deliuerance from the seruitude of your kings: but he shall not respect your prayers, but neglecting and repelling them, shall suffer you to beare the penaltie of your euill counsaile. Although these future inconueniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect and set light by them: and not suffering that sinister opinion which before that time they had conceived in their minds, to be alred or frustrated in them, they insisted with al obstinacy, requiring (without any care of future mishaps) that they might haue a king created ouer them, because (as they said) it was very necessarie that they should haue a king that might wage warre with them, to reuenge them on their enemies, and repress their aduersaries forces, and that there was no absurditie in it, but that they might be gouerned in the same sort as their neighbours were. Samuel perceiuing that his perswasions could preuaile nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diuerted from that resolution wherein they persisted, he spake thus: Go your waies for this time euerie one of you vnto your houses, and I will cause you to bee assembled when the cause requireth, and when God shall haue informed me what king he will giue you.

Whilest then hee arriued neere vnto the Citie of Ramatha, the seruant that followed him, certifi- ed him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whose foresight the knowledge of the truth was subiect, towards whom hee counsailed him to adresse himselfe, with assurance and confi- dence, that by him hee should vnderstand what was become of his Asles. Saul replied, that hee had no meanes left to recompence the Prophet, by reason they had consumed all the money they had brought forth with them in their iourney. His seruant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a sicke, which they might giue him: but they were both of them deceived, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew neere vnto the gates of the Citie, they met with certain maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gaue them directions, telling them that they were to make haste before that he were set downe to supper, by reason he at that time entertain- ed diuers guests, and he himselfe was first wont to sit downe at the upper end of the table. Samuel had inuited this company, by reason that all the day long hee had instantly besought God, that hee would declare vnto him, who it was that should be established king, and God also gaue him to vnderstand that hee would informe him the next day after, and that about the same houre hee would send a young man vnto him of the tribe of Beniamin. For this cause Samuel sat in his house expecting the asignation: which being come, hee came downe vnder pretence to go to supper, and in the way he met with Saul. Saul addressing himselfe vnto Samuel, besought him that he would shew him the Prophets lod- ging, by reason that hee was a stranger and knew it not. Samuel told him that himselfe was the man to whom hee spake, and led him to the banquet; assuring him that his Asles (in search of whom he had trauelled so long) were in safetie, and that all mens goods were at his commaund. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too base to hope or expect so much; and further, my familie is the least of all the families: you therefore iest and mocke at me, in speaking of such things as sur- passe my condition. The Prophet tooke him by the hand, and brought both him and his ser- uant to the table, and placed him aboue all those that were inuited, who were to the number of seuentie. Samuel commanded that the royall portion should be set before Saul: and when the houre of bed time came, all the rest arose and departed to their houses, but Saul and his seruant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as soone as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and depart- ing with him out of towne, he commanded him to send his seruant before, and to remaine him- selfe with him behind, because he had certaine things to impart vnto him in priuate. Hereupon Saul sent away his seruant, and Samuel taking a cruet with oyle, poured the same vpon the yong mans head, and embracing him said: Be thou king elected by God against the Philistines, and for the defence of the Hebrewes. Thou shalt haue this signe which I now shall informe thee of, of thy future honour. When thou shalt bee parted from hence, thou shalt overtake three men in the way, who trauell to Bethel to adore and sacrifice vnto God: the first of which, thou shalt see bearing three loaves, the second shall beare a goat, and the third shall follow carrying a glasse of wine. These shall embrace thee and caresse thee: they shall giue thee two loaves, and thou shalt receiue them. And from thence shalt thou depart vnto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou shalt meete with a messenger, that shall certifie thee that the Asles are found. From thence comming vnto Gabatha, thou shalt finde the Prophets assembled in their congregation, and being rauished by the spirit of God, thou shalt prophecy amongst them: so that whosoeuer shall behold thee, shall be rauished in admiration, and shall say: VVhence cometh it to passe, that the sonne of Cis hath attained to so good fortune? and when thou hast had these signes, know that God shall be with thee: salute thy father and thy kinsmen in my behalfe. Hereafter thou shalt repaire and be sent vnto me vnto Galgal, to offer sacrifices of thanksgiuing vnto God. Hauing in this manner told and foretold him that which is forespoken, hee gaue him licence to depart; and all these things hapned vnto Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had prophesied vnto him. When Saul was arriued at Abners house, who was his vnckle (whome he loued aboue all the rest of his other familiars:) Abner questioned with him about his voiage, and as touching those things which had chaunced vnto him: and Saul had nothing from him, but

A but point by point informed him of all that which had hapned vnto him, during his being and a- board with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had declared vnto him the recouerie of his Asles: but as touching the royaltie, and those things that concerned the same, hee concealed them; suppo- sing that if it should be made knowne, it would not be beleueed; but that hee should reape hate thereby. For although he were both his friend and couzen, yet thought he it more secure and conuenient for him to burie the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himselfe the infir- mitie of mans nature, that no man is constant in loue, but although by manifest assistance from God, felicitie fall vpon any man, yet other men do grieue & repine that any one should be prefer- red before them.

After this, Samuel assembled the people in the Citie of Maspha, where he framed his speech in B such sort, as he certified them of those things which he had receiued from God, namely that hee hauing procured their libertie, and brought their enemies in subiection vnder them; next how they were forgetfull of so many benefites, and had degraded God of his royaltie; as if they were ignorant, that the greatest good that might happen vnto men, is to be gouerned by him that is the soueraigne good; how they had determined to haue a man to their King, who according to his pleasure & appetite, or according to the vnbrided bent of his passion, would vie them like slaues made subiect vnto him, and would vsurpe vpon their goods without forbearing any thing what- soeuer; that men are not so studious to maintaine their handie workes and labours, as God, who hath an inestimable care of those whom he hath created. Notwithstanding (saith hee) since you haue thus determined, and are after this manner resolued, and that the outrage which you haue enterprised against God, preuaileth with you, set your selues all of you in order according to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots. To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Beniamin, which being cast the second time, light on the familie of Metri, and afterwards being approved by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Cis, to haue the kingdom. The young man, who before that time knew what should happen, had slept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seeme that he had desired this dignity, and such moderation & temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out, that di- uers cannot conceale the ioy they conceiue, if any face of felicitie smile vpon them; but manifest the same vnto all men: yet notwithstanding he not onely was void of vaine appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many wortheie people) but that which is more, he stole away D from the presence of those men ouer whom hee should commaund, and so handled all things that he made them seeke after him, and trauell to find him out. Whilest therefore they carefully sought, & knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet praied God that he would shew them where he was, & that he would bring him into their presence: when as therefore he was enformed by God in what place he remained, Samuel sent out certaine messengers to conduct him thither, & as soone as he came amongst them, Samuel set and placed him in the midst of the people: now was hee more high then any of the companie by the shoulders; and had a kingly and goodly shape and appearance: then spake the Prophet after this manner. God hath giuen you this man to be your king, behold how he surpasseth you all, and shewes himselfe worthy to be your Prince. But as soone as the people had cried God saue the king; the Prophet, who had reduced into writ- ings all those mischiefs that should befall them, read the same vnto them in the hearing of the King, and put the booke into the Tabernacle of God for a perpetual testimonie vnto posterity of those things which in future ages should succeed, according as hee had fore-prophecied: which done, Samuel dismissed the people, and returned to the Citie of Ramath, which was his countrey. But Saul departing vnto Gabatha, diuers worthy men gaue their attendance on him, and did him the honour that appertained vnto a king. But diuers seditious and loose companions, who set him at noughts, both mocked them, and those things which they did, neither brought they any pre- sents vnto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, any wayes to respect their King. A moneth after his instalment, there fell a waere betwixt him and Naas King of the Am- monites, which was the original of that honour which was generally attributed vnto him by the whole multitude: this Naas had offred diuers outrages vnto those Iewes that dwell on the other side of Iordan. For he had trauesed the riuer with a great and huge armie leuiued against them; & had overcome diuers of their Cities. For at that time hee vsed force and violence against them: & to the intent that they might not rebell, neither deliuer themselves from his subiection, he vsed this subtiltie and prevention to cut off all colour and occasion from them, of opposition. For to those that surrendered themselves, & subscribed to his mercy, & to those that were take captiues, or con- quered in the warres, hee plucked out their right eies: and this did he to that intent, that when they should should defend themselves, they should haue their left sides covered with their bucklers, and by that meanes be made vnapt to enter battell. The king of the Ammonites hauing after this manner dealt with those on the other side of Iordan, heled his armie towards the Galaadites, and encamped neere vnto their chiefe Citie called Iabes, to which hee sent heralds to sommon the inhabitants to surrender the same, vnder these conditions: either to suffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or else by enduring the siege, to see the finall ouerthrow both of themselves, and of their Citie: wishing them to make choice of which they list, whether they would lose a little part of their bodie, or hazard both their fortunes and liues at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this so doubtfull and dreadfull an election, neither durst returne an hostile or peaceable answer, but asked truce for seven daies, to the end that sending their messengers to their kinsfolke, they might craue their aide: which if they could obtaine they would warre; and otherwise they promised to submit themselves vnto the enemy, vnder what condition soeuer were best pleasing vnto him. Nahas, that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their answer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewise to craue assistance at all their hands, who were their associates. Whereupon they presently sent messengers from citie to citie, and certified the Israelites of all that which Nahas had done vnto them, and the extremitie whereunto they were reduced. The Israelites hauing before time vnderstood in what estate they of Iabes were, had grievously lamented & conceived great displeasure thereat; but the feare that afflicted them, suffed them to assit their friends in no other manner then by commiseration: yet as soone as their messengers arriued in the Citie where Saul was, and that they had recounted vnto him the daungers wherewith the Iabesites were oppressed; the people were as in times past moued with compassion. For they lamented the miserie of their Parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the Citie, perceiued the inhabitants drowned in their teares, & enquiring of them for what cause they were so confused and abashed, he was certified of that, which the messengers had reported: and on the instant he was rauished by a diuine motion, and sent the Embassadors backe againe to those that sent them, promising that within three daies he would come and succour them, and that hee would haue the vpper hand of the enemy before sunnerise, to the end that the rising sunne might beholde them victorious, and deliuered from all feare. Meane while he commaunded some of them to make stay with him, to the intent they might guide and direct him in his way.

CHAP. VI.

The combate and victorie of Saul against the Ammonites.

Saul desirous to incite the people to issue out and make warre vpon the Ammonites, to the intent vnder a penaltie he might assemble them with more readines, he houghed his owne oxen, and threatened all those whom he met withall to doe the like vnto theirs, except the next day they presented themselves with their armes vpon the banke of Iordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march vnto the place whither by them they should be conducted.

The feare of this penaltie published among the tribes, made them gather to head about the same time, so that all the assemblies of the people were mustered in the Citie of Bala. In this suruey besides those of the tribe of Iuda, there were numbred seven hundred thousand men, and of the tribe of Iuda in particular, there were seuentie thousand. Hauing therefore passed Iordan and marched some ten cables length of Nilus (which is about some three leagues) all the night time, before the sunne rose, he attained the place whither he intended to conduct them, and diuiding his armie into three parts, he assailed the enemy on euery side, that suspected no such encounter and fighting valiantly against them, he slew diuers, and amongst the rest Nahas King of the Ammonites. This victorie made Sauls name famous amongst all the Hebrewes, so that he was wonderfully praised and honoured for his valour: so that if before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they chaunged their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worst of them all. For he was not satisfied to redeeme and deliuer those of Iabes, but hee entered the Countrey of the Ammonites also, and foraged the same with his armie, and vtterly ouerthrew them: and after he had obtained a great bootie and prey, both he and his victoriously and magnifically returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleased with this noble action atchieued by Saul, reioyced because they had chosen them so noble a King, and exclaimed against those that said, that it would be discommodious and vnprofitable for their common

A common-weale, saying, Where are now these murmurers, let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people beset with some good successe, is wont to speake and enforce against them: that let light by the authors & inducers of the same. Saul received great content and comfort thorow this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithstanding hee swore that no one of their tribe should be put to death that day, because it would not seeme conuenient nor agreeable, that the victorie which was given them by God, should be mixed with the blood of their brethren, but rather that it was more decent and comely that the time should be spent in feast and iollitie. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behooued them to confirme the kingdome to Saul by a second election: and to that end, they assembled together in the Citie of Galgal, according as he had commaunded them: and there in the sight of all the people Samuel annointed Saul the second time with the consecrated oyle, and proclaimed him king anew. Thus was the Aristocracie and gouernment of the better sort amongst the Hebrewes, turned into a Monarchie. For vnder Moses and his disciple Iesus, who gouerned the Emphyre, and armie at that time, the nobilitie and elected worthe men ruled the State. After whose death for the space of 18. whole yeares, the people was without gouernment, the common-weale not long after reasumed her pristie policie; and the gouernment was given vnto him, which was esteemed the most valiant in warre, and the most vpriight in doing of iustice. All which time for this cause hath been called the time of the Iudges.

After this the Prophet Samuel assembled the people, and spake vnto them after this manner: I coniure you by that great God that hath given life to those two brothers (I meane Moses and Aaron) and that hath deliuered your forefathers from the Egyptians, & their tyranny, that with our any affection either of feare or shame, or instigation of any other passion, you truly testifie whether I haue comitted any sinister or wicked act, either for profit sake, or for avarice, or fauour: Reproue me, if I haue taken away any mans calfe, or sheepe, or any other thing whatsoever, but that which I might lawfully take for my reliefe and sustenance, and at such hands as willingly offered me the same; or if I haue drawne any mans beasts to my vse, or vied his cattell to my profit and his hinderance: in these and such like, if I haue offended any man, let him now accuse mee in the presence of the King. All of them cried out with one voyce, that no such default had beene committed by him, but that he had gouerned their nation in holinesse and iustice. After that the people had thus publicly testified in the behalfe of Samuel, hee said vnto them: Since you haue liberally & freely protested, that you haue no cause of wrong to vrge or enforce against me, heare I pray you, that wherewith I can iustly accuse you of. You haue grievously offended agaynst the maiestie of God, in that you haue required a King at his hands: you should haue rather remembered, that your old father Jacob accompanied onely with his 70. sons came into Egypt, constrained thereunto by famine, and that in that countrey diuers thousands of persons issued from his loynes, whom the Egyptians kept in captiuitie, offering them extreame outrages: And when as your fathers called vpon God, how he wonderfully deliuered them from the necessities wherin they were, without giuing them any king, contenting themselves with two brothers Moses and Aaron, who brought and conducted you into this countrey which you possesse at this present. And although you participated these benefites by the hands of God, yet notwithstanding you haue not forborne both to forget religion, and neglect pietie. This notwithstanding, at such time as you haue beene conquered by your enemies, he hath set you free, gracing you first of all with the ouerthrow of the Assyrians & their forces: secondly, giuing you victorie ouer the Ammonites, & Moabites: and finally ouer the Philistines. Now these great exploits were performed by you, nor vnder the conduct of a king, but by thy direction of Iepha and Gideon: what folly therefore hath bewitched you to make you flie from God, and to seeke to liue vnder the subiection of a King? But I haue named such a one vnto you, whom God hath chosen to be your gouernour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I may giue you a manifest testimony, that gods wrath is whetted against you, because you haue desired to haue a king; I will strue to expresse it vnto you, by visible signes done by God himselfe, I will therefore require of God, that he will make you see in this place, and in the heart of sommer such a storme, that there is not any one of you, that hath euer scene the like thereof: Scarce had he spoken the words, but that sodainly there fell great store of lightning, thunder and haile, in approbation of that which the Prophet had said: so that amazed and transported with feare, all of them confessed that they had offended. They notwithstanding professed that their error was of ignorance, nor of obstinacie, and besought the Prophet that with a good and fatherly affection, hee would beseech God to appease his wrath towards them, and forgiue them their offences at that present; which to their other grievous negligences they had annexed annexed and wherby they had transgressed his holy will. All which Samuel promised them to do, and besought God that it would please him to pardon them the error which they had committed in that behalf, and that it would please him to be appeased by his prayers. Besides this, he exhorted them to live vprightly, and to keepe in their continuall remembrance what euils had hapned vnto them, for that they had forsaken the way of vertue; and what wonders God had done, and what lawes he had giuen by Moses, all which they ought to meditate on, if they desired to be in safetie, and liue happily with their king. But if they should contemne the same, hee foretold them that both themselves & their kings should be grievously punished. Samuel hauing prophesied these things vnto the Hebrewes, dismissed them to their owne dwellings, after he had confirmed the kingdome to Saul the second time.

BVt when the king had mustered his men, and chosen out three thousand of the choicest soldiers, he appointed two thousand of the for the gard of his person, & with them went & dwelt at Bethel. There he gaue in charge to his son Jonathan, & sent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there, who, folowed by them, valiantly ouercame a garrison of the Philistines nere vnto Gebal. For the Philistines of Gaba hauing gotten the vpper hand ouer the Iewes, had taken their armes from them, and seiled and fortified both with men and munition in the strongest Cities of their country; prohibiting them to beare armes, and in generall from the vse of any yron: by reason of which inhibition, if their husbandmen had at any time need of any yron worke, as of plough-shares, mattocks, or any such other instrument fit for manuring or tillage of their landes, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongst the Philistines.

Now when the Philistines had gotten some intelligence that their garrison was after this manner defeated, they were wonderfully moued, and supposing amongst themselves that the iniurie and outrage was in no sort to be suffered, they armed themselves against the Iewes, and went out embattailed with three hundred thousand footmen, thirtie thousand chariots, and six thousand horse, encamping with their whole host nere vnto the Citie of Machmas. Which when Saul the king of the Hebrewes vnderstood, he marched toward the Citie of Galgal: and as hee traualled thorow the country, he animated and encouraged the people to recouer their libertie, proclaiming warre against the Philistines: whose forces he so little feared, as he mocked thereat, saying, that they deserved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any daunger which might accrew by their encounter. But when Sauls souldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly discomfited, so that some of them hid themselves in denes and places vnder the earth, others fled on the other side of Iordan into the country of the Gadites and Rubenines. But Saul sent for the Prophet, resolving to consult with him vpon the estate of the war, who gaue him answer, that he should attend in the same place where he was, and that he should prepare beafts for sacrifice, because that within seven dayes he would come vnto him and sacrifice on the seventh day: which done, he might encounter the enemy. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet obserued he not intirely all that which Samuel had inioyned him. For when he perceived that he was somewhat slacke in comming, and that his soldiers waxed wearie, he tooke the beafts that were prepared for the sacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards vnderstanding that Samuel was arriued, he went out to meete him, and doe him honour. Samuel told him, that he had done amisse, by reason he had neglected that which was commaunded him, presuming before his arriuall (who was sent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer prayers and sacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both discovered his rashnesse, and disorder in sacrificing. Saul excused himselfe, alledging that he had staid during the terme of seven dayes which were appointed him: vrging further, that necessitie, and the depart of his souldiours, together with the feare of the aduersie armie which were in Machmas, and the intelligence hee had receyued that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer sacrifice: Samuel replied, saying, Thou hadst done more aduisedly, if thou hadst obeyed, and not contemned God by thine ouerhaste, whose minister and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mightest both haue gotten an assurance and continuance of thy kingdome to thy selfe, and succession to thy posteritie. This said, being displeased with that which had hapned, he returned back

A to his owne house, and Saul with six hundred souldiers (onely accompanied with his sonne Jonathan) came vnto the Citie of Gabeon. The greater part of these men were disarmed, by reason that the country was intirely destitute of iron, and workemen that were expert and skilfull in forging & making armour: for the Philistines permitted them not to haue any, as we haue declared a litle before. These diuiding their armie into three battels, inuaded the country of the Hebrews by so many wayes, destroying and forraging all things, both in the sight of king Saul, and of his sonne, who neither could inhibit their incursions, nor by reason of their multitudes make head against them. Both he therefore and his sonne, and Achias the high Priest, sate them downe vpon a hillocke, and seeing the country spoyled round about them, they were much dismaied. But Sauls sonne conspired and concluded with his esquire and harnesse-bearer, to enter secretly into the enemies campe, and raise an vprore and alarm in the same; who willingly promising and offering him his seruice to aduenture with him in all occasions and places, with the hazard of his life: they both of them descended from the mountaine, and marched directly towards the enemies campe, who had pitched their tents on a hie pointed rocke, which extended it selfe in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a banke, as it were a wall and fortification against the incursion of their enemies. For which cause they kept their watch somewhat too carelessly, because the place was fortified by nature: so that no man might ascend, or assaile them, but with disaduantage. When as therefore they had gotten nere vnto the campe, Jonathan encouraged his companion, and animated him to assaile the enemy after this manner. If (saith he) they espie vs, & will vs to ascend, let vs take this summons of theirs for an assured token of victorie: but if they hold their peace, and call vs not, let vs returne backe againe.

C As therefore they approached the enemies host about the beginning and brie of day, the Philistines said the one vnto the other: The Hebrewes creep out of their caues and dens. Then cried they out to Jonathan, and his harnesse bearer, saying: Come hither, come hither vnto vs, to the end wee may plague you according to your audacious enterprife. Sauls sonne quickly taking hold of these their words, and esteeming them for an ominous and assured token of victorie, departed with his esquire from the place where they were first discovered, answering them that he would shortly visit them. So withdrawing himselfe on the other side of the rock, which by reason of the situation thereof was left vnguarded, ouercomming the difficultie of the place with great labour, at last they attained the place where the enemy was, whom they found asleepe, and assailing them slue twentie of them, and filled the whole armie with terror and amazednesse: so that casting away their weapons they fled amain: some other being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, inuaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themselves that onely two Hebrewes durst neuer ascend and enter their campe, they addrest themselves to their mutual murder and slaughter: so that some of them were slaine, others fled to escape the sword, and fell headlong down the rocks. But when as the kings espials had told him what confusion and disorder was befallen in the campe of the Philistines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were ablent: and hearing that his sonne and his harnesse-bearer were missing, he commanded the high Priest, that attired in his pontificall ornaments, hee should prophecy that which should succede: who assuring him that he should obtaine the victorie ouer his enemies, hee sallied out

D and assaulted the Philistines, and ran vpon them, who were thus confused and disordered, and whetted the one against the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes such, as before times were fled into dens and places vnder ground, as soone as they heard that the victorie inclined on Sauls side: so that gathering together to the number of ten thousand Hebrewes, he pursued his scattered enemies thorow all the country. But afterward, a great inconuenient hapned vnto Saul, proceeding from the ioy hee had conceiued by this victorie (for commonly such as are blessed by such good fortunes, are not masters of their owne affections and reasons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to satiate himselfe with reuenge for all those iniuries he had receiued from the Philistines, he published an imprecation or curse amongst the Hebrewes against any one whomsoever, that intermitting the chase and slaughter should take shewance before night, purposing vntill darke night neither to giue ouer pursuit or slaughter. This execration thus published by Saul, it chaunced that his sonne that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his father, nor the general ratification and allowance of the same by the people, falling into a certaine groue belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many swarmes of Bees, he by chance light vpon an honie combe, and pressing the honie thereout, afterwards did eat the same. Afterwards hauing intelligence that his father had vnder a grievous penaltie of execration, forbidden any man to taste any sort of meate before sunne set, he gaue ouer eating further:

ther: yet said he, that his father had done amisse therein in publishing that prohibition, by reason that if they had receiued sustenance, they might with greater force and forwardesse pursue the enimie that fled, and ouertake and slaughter them in greater number. Killing therefore many thousands of the Palestines partie, about the euening they began to ransacke and spoile the campe of the Philistines, and bore away from thence great spoyles, and a wonderfull number of cattell, part of which were slaine and eaten with the blood, contrarie to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and signified to the king, how the people had offended against God, by slaughtering the beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either washt or purified from the blood: Saul commanded that a great stone should be rowled into the midst of the place, and commanded the people to kill and sacrifice their beasts vpon the same: and that they should for-beare to eate the flesh with the blood, because it was not agreeable vnto God. All which was performed according as the king had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offered a burnt sacrifice vnto God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assaile the enemies campe, and sacke all that was therein before the day spring, whilst his men of warre diligently followed him, and shewed great forwardnes in the execution of his command: the king asked counsell of the high Priest Achitob, whether God would giue him the victorie, and permit those that should enter the enemies campe, to returne from thence with victorie. The high Priest certified him that God returned him no answer: which when he vnderstood, it is not without cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to giue a willing answer in that which we ought to doe: but there must needs be some hidden sinne in vs, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be silent. But I sweare I by the same God, that although mine owne sonne Jonathan hath committed that sinne, to the end I may appease God, I will with no lesse seueritie execute him, then any one stranger that is neither by alliance nor affinitie tied vnto me. Now when the people cried out and encouraged him to the performance of that he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and he standing with his sonne apart, began by casting lots to find out him that was faultie. Now when the lot fell vpon Jonathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his owne conscience he was guiltie of. To whom he answered, I know no other thing, but that yesterday being in pursuit of the enimie, and ignorant of thine edict, I tasted of a lionie combe: but Saul swore that he would slay him, setting more by his oath, then either by kined, nature, or affection. He nothing astonished with his present perill, with a generous and dreadlesse minde, presented himselfe with this reple: O father (said he) I intreat no fauour at thy hands: for I will willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly because I haue seene so famous a victorie: For I shall die thorowly contented to see the insolencie of the Palestines ouermasted by the power of the Hebrewes. This valour and courage of the yong man moued the whole multitude to remorse and commiseration: so that they swore all of them that they would not suffer that Jonathan, who was the author of so famous a victorie, should be slaine: and therefore rescued they the yong man from his displeased father, and made vowes vnto God to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul after he had slaine about sixtie thousand of his enemies, returned with victorie to his owne home, and reigned afterwards very happily, & ouercame by force the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalechites, and king Oba that dwelt neere about him. He had three sonnes, Jonathan, Iosuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob, and Michal. The generall of his armie was Abner, the sonne of his vnckle called Ner: for Ner and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and sonnes of Abiel. He was verie rich both in horse and chariots, and against whatsoever enimie he marched forth, he alwayes returned with victorie: so that he reduced the affaires of the Hebrews to a happy estate, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those nations that neighboured vpon them. But the chiefeft of the youth, that either preuailed in strength, or exceeded in beautie, he chose to be of his guard.

Sauls victorie against the Amalechites.

BVt Samuel comming vnto Saul, told him that hee was sent vnto him by God, to admonish him how he had chosen him about the rest, and preferred him to the kingdom: and for that cause that it behooued him to be obedient vnto him in all things, because he ruled the people; but God both kings, kingdomes, and all things. Thus therefore (said hee) doth

A doth God command thee. Since the Amalechites offered many iniuries vnto the Hebrewes in the desert, whilst in their departure out of Egypt, they travelled into that region which they now inhabite; it behooueth thee to punish them by a most iust warre: and hauing overcome them, that thou utterly extinguisht their memorie, without regard either of sex or yeares; and this reuenge shalt thou execute vpon them, in repayment of those iniuries they in times past offered to our forefathers. Neither shalt thou spare either beast or horse, or flocke, to apply them to thy profit or particular vse: but thou shalt consecrate all vnto God, and according as Moses commanded it, deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All these things did Saul promise to performe, and supposing obedience consisted in this, not only in the acting, but also the speedie execution of that which was enioyned him, hee presently assembled all his forces together, and mustering his souldiers at Galgal, he found about fortie thousand, besides the tribe of Iuda, which of it selfe afforded and allowed thirtie thousand chosen men: with these did Saul enter the country of the Amalechites, and laid diuers ambushes neere vnto a riuer, not only to assaile them with open and hostile warre, but also to enclose and surpriseth them at vnwares, and kill them amidst their hie wayes: Hee charged them therefore, and put them to flight, and discomfited their whole armie, pursuing them that fled. Which execution of his, hauing that answerable successe (according as God had promised him before) he marched onwards, and besieged the Cities of the Amalechites, and ouercame some of them by batterie, some by mines and countermures raised on the outside: othertome by famine and thirst, and diuers other waies. And in those Cities which he ouercame, hee neither spared women nor children, neither supposing their murder to be cruell, neither inhumane: first, for that he executed it vpon his enimie; next for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandement, towards whom his disobedience might redound to his vtter overthrow. He tooke Agag prisoner also, who was the King of the Amalechites, whose beautie and personage seemed vnto him so well proportioned and perfect, that he wondered thereat, and thought him worthie to be kept alivie; and that not by Gods commandement, but ouercome by his owne affection, vsurping vpon an vngraunted priuledge of mercie to his owne prejudice: For God so hated the Amalechites, that hee spared not their infants, who ought in naturall compulsion to haue bene more pitied then the rest. But Saul kept alivie the king of his enemies, and the author of all the Hebrewes euils, setting more by his beautie the Gods commandement. This sinne of his the people presently imitated: for they spared both horse and other kind of cattell, and made prey of them, notwithstanding that God had charged them to reserve nothing. They caried away with them all other moueables and riches, and onely consumed those things which were of smallest vawle by fire. This victorie had Saul ouer those people that dwell betwixt Pelusium, which is a Citie on the borders of Egypt, vnto the red sea. But he meddled not with the Sichemites, which inhabite in the midst of the Madi-nites, whom before the battell he had commanded to retire themselves, lest they should partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied vnto them, by reason of Ra-guel, Moses father in law; the Hebrewes had cause to procure their safetie. Saul hauing obtained this victorie, & reioicing at his good successe, returned to his owne home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his war with the Amalechites, but as if he had precisely obserued all that which was en-ioyned him. But God was sore displeased, both for that the king of the Amalechites was preserved, and for that the people had made prey of their cattell: for both these actions of theirs were expressly against Gods permission. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortall King; that they should neglect and contemne his lawes and decrees, by whose onely means they were furthered and fauoured in their victorie. For which cause God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented him in that he had chosen Saul for their king, considering that hee infringed his com-mandements, and gouerned himselfe according to his owne appetites. When Samuel heard these words, he was sore troubled, and besought God all the night long, that hee would appeale his wrath and displeasure conceiued against Saul: but notwithstanding all the importunities, and praiers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no sort be reconciled, because it was inconuenient that the sinnes, which were committed by Saul, should be remitted by Samuels submission and intercession. For sinne neuer more augmenteth and increaseth, then when such as are offended are too remisse in their punishments: for whilst they would be reputed both for good and mercifull, they themselves both vnwares, and vnwitting, become the authors of sinne.
When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his request, and it manifestly appeared that no praiers or supplication might appease him; as soone as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at that time remained in Galgal. Now as soone as the king appeerciued him, hee ranne vnto him G

, and embraced him, saying: I giue God thanks for the victorie; and all those things which hee commanded me, I haue performed. But Samuel replied and said: How commeth it then to passe, that I heare this bleating of sheepe, and bellowing of beasts thorow the army? Saul answered, that the people had reserved that cattell for sacrifices; and that besides them, all the nation of the A-
the people had reserved that cattell for sacrifices; and that besides them, all the nation of the A-one remaining, but that he onely had reserved the King, whom he would cause to bee presented before him, to the end they might consult together what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answered: that God tooke no pleasure in sacrifices, but such as were good and iust, and such (said he) are they that are according to his will and commandement; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God refuseth H not him that sacrificeth not, but him that disobeyeth him. For he willingly accepteth not those sacrifices that are offered vnto him by those that submit not themselves vnto him, and offer not vnto him the true and onely offerings, yea though they present diuers and many great sacrifices, and bring him sundrie Jewels of gold and silver, but reiecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of pietie, but testimonies of wickednesse: But hee taketh pleasure in those onely that observe that which hee hath pronounced and commanded, making choise rather to die, then and any wayes to infringe the same: not seeking that sacrifices should be offered vnto him; but if they be offered, although of small and no valew, yet are they more acceptable vnto him in pouertie and obedience, then all those which the richest hand, or strongest fortune can afford him any waies. Know thou therefore (said he) that thou hast incurd Gods displeasure, in that thou hast I contemned and neglected his commandements: for how canst thou thinke that he will regard thy sacrifices with a gracious eye, which hee himselfe hath adiudged to vtter perdition and ruine? except thou thinke that to offer such things vnto GOD, bee in effect no lesse then to seeker out death: Bee assured therefore of the losse both of thy kingdome, and power, which hath in such sort transported thee, that thou hast contemned God, who bestowed the same vpon thee. But Saul confessed that hee had sinned and done amisse, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alledged hee that he was compelled to doe the same, in that he durst not restraîne the souldier, who was wher and kindled vpon the prey: but (said hee) bee fauoura-ble and mercifull vnto me, for hereafter I will take heede least I fall into the like sinne: and hee besought him that he would stay with him so long whilest he might offer a peace offering in his behalf. But he that foresaw and knew that God would bee moued by no sacrifice, began to depart.

BUt Saul willing to retain Samuel, tooke hold of his garment, and for that the Prophet hastily withdrew himselfe, he tore away a part thereof, by reason that Samuel violently withdrew himselfe from him. To whom the Prophet said, that in like sort his kingdome should be rent from him, and that another who was more honest and upright, should take possession thereof: for God continued in his determination intended against him, because that to change & varie opinion is humane passion and not diuine puissance. Saul answered, that he had grievously sinned, but it was impossible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithstanding besought him, that in the presence of the people he would as yet doe him honor, at such time as he should walke with him, & cast himself before the presence of God: which Samuel condescended vnto, and went with him to adore God. After this, Agag the king of the Amalechites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament and complaine that death was verie bitter and tedious; to whom he answered in this manner following. As thou hast caused diuers mothers amongst the Hebrews to weepe and lament the losse of their children; so shalt thou cause thy mothers sorrow and torment for thy death: which said, he presently commanded that he should be put to death in Galgal: as for himselfe he returned backe againe to the citie of Ramath. But the king perceiuing in himselfe into how many mischiefs he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chiefe citie called Gaba (which name signifieth a hillock) & from that day forwards he neuer more came into the prophet Samuels presence, who was heartily sorie for his fall: But God commanded him to giue ouer his care, & that taking with him the sacred oyle he should repaire to the citie of Bethleem to Iesse the son of Obed, and that there he should

A should annoynt one of his sons for king according as he had commanded him:& when as the Prophet said that he was afraid, least Saul getting notice thereof, should either by treason or open force seek to slay him, being encouraged & assured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed town. In that place was he saluted with great concourse of people, & each of the inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither: who answered them that he came to offer sacrifice vnto God. Now when the oblations were performed, he invited Iesse and his sonnes to banquet with him; and beholding the eldest of them to be faire and well proportioned, hee coniectured by his stature and seemeliness, that it should bee he that was to be elected king; but in this matter he attained not the scope of Gods prouidence. For demanding whether he should annoynt that yong man whom in admiration he thought so worthe of the kingdom: it was answered him that men saw not in such manner as God doth. For thou (said he) beholding the beautie of the yong man, supposest him worthe of the kingdom: but I prize not royaltie and government of estate, by the beauties of the bodie, but by the vertues of the soule: and him require I that is perfectly furnished herewith, and hath his mind beautified with pietie, iustice, obedience and fortitude. Vpon these words Samuel commanded Iesse to bring all his other sonnes into his presence, who presented him with five others, the eldest of which was called Eliab, the second Aminadab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fift Rael, and the sixt Asam. Now when the Prophet beheld these likewise no lesse beautifull men then was the eldest, he asked of God which of them hee should choose for king; hee answered him that he should choose neither of them: for which cause he enquired of Iesse whether he had any other sons besides them: who told him that he had one which

C was called Dauid, who had the care and custodie of his flockes. Him did the Prophet sodainly command him to send for, alledging that it was impossible for them to sit downe to the banquet, except he were present. Now when Dauid was arrived according as his father had commanded him, Samuel seeing him faire in colour, quicke in eye, and otherwaies answerable to his naturall ornaments: This is he (said he in priuate to himselfe) who is accepted & elected by God to be our king. This said, hee sat downe at the table, and made the yong man sit about him, and both Iesse his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruets of oyle in the presence of the said Dauid, he annointed him, and told him in his eare, how God had chosen him to bee king, and exhorted him to studie iustice, and to bee obedient to that which should be commaunded him, assuring him by that meanes, that his kingdom should be of long continuance, his familie and stock should be famous and renowned, & that he should ouercome the Philistines, and conquer those nations against whom he should fight, & obtaine glorious renowne in his life time, and leaue the same to his successors as an inheritance. Samuel hauing made this exhortation departed from him, and the spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entered into Dauid, so as he began to propheticke, by meanes of a diuine spirit wherewith he was seised: whereas on the other side, Saul was tormented with strange passions of the euill spirit, whereby he fell into strange suffocations, and stranglings: so as his Physicians could not inuent any remedie for him, but gaue counsell that search should be made, if a man might be found that were expert and cunning in singing & playing on the harpe, to the end that when the euill spirit should assault & trouble him, he might stand at his head, and both with voice and instrument sing sacred hymnes before him.

E And when as the king had giuen present and speedy command, that such a one should be sought after, one of those that were assistant told him that hee had seene in Bethleem a sonne of Iesses, a yong man of excellent feature, and besides his other good parts and bringing vp, verie cunning both in song and playing on the Harpe: and besides that, addrest enough and toward in feates of armes. He therefore sent messengers to Iesse to command him to withdraw Dauid from the folds, and to send him vnto him, because that hauing heard report of his beautie and valour, he was desirous to see him. This command of his did Iesse obey, & sent his sonne with presents vnto Saul the king, who greatly reioiced vpon his arriuall, and made him his pentioner, and honoured him diuerse wayes. For he was refreshed by him, and was his onely Physition against the vexation of euill spirits, at such time as they seised and possessed him: for by reciting and singing Psalmes vpon his Harpe, he restored the king to his right mind: he therefore requested Iesse that he would suffer him to liue with him, and attend vpon him, because hee was so much delighted with his presence, whereunto he condescended, permitting him to dwell with the king.

NOr long time after this, the Philiftines aſſembled themſelves, and gathered together great companies of men of warre, with whom they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and ſubdued all that which is betwene Sucoth and Azeca, where they incamped. Saul on the other ſide led forth his army againſt them, & incamping himſelf vpon a certaine mountain, he constrained the Philiftines to diſlodge from their firſt campe, and intrench themſelves vpon an other mountaine right ouer againſt that where hee pitched his tents. The campe being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended itſelfe betwene both the armies: Into this there deſcended a certaine man called Goliath, a Gittite, of huge ſtature, being foure cubites and a ſpan length in height, hauing his limmes couered with huge and mightie armour for his cures which he bare on his back weighed ſue thouſand ſicles; his helmet and pauldrons were of braſſe, made fit to couer his maſie mebers; his ſpear which he bare in his hand was no light lance, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, & the head therof weighed 600. ſicles, and after him there followed diuers men bearing armes. Now when he came betwixt both the armies, he ſtood vp and cried with a loud voice, addreſſing his ſpeech to Saul, & the Hebrewes, in theſe rearmes: Hebrewes, what neede you to hazard the doubtfull fortune of warre? Single me out an aduerſarie, and let vs determine by our two hazards on whoſe ſide the victorie and conqueſt ſhall fall: ſo that whoſe ſouer ſouldier ſhall be ouercome, let his partie be adiudged ſubiection to their ſides who haue the victorie: for it were better that ſome one among you, then the whole armie ſhould be brought in hazard. When he had ſpoken thus, he returned backe to his owne campe. The next day he came forth againe and vſed the ſame wordes, and thus for fortie dayes ſpace ceaſed he not to deſie the Hebrewes in ſuch like wordes, and vnder the ſame conditions: ſo that both Saul and all his armie were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelves alwayes readie and arraunged in battell; although the fight was begonne on neither ſide. During the time that Saul addreſſed himſelfe to this expedition, he ſent David backe againe to Jeſſe his father (contenting himſelfe with his other three brothers, who at that time ſerued vnder his royall ſtandard) where hee intended his intermitted care of keeping his flockes: But whileſt the war was rather protracted then performed, whether his father had ſent him to carie victuals to his brothers, and to know how their affaires went in the armie, and whileſt that David deuſed with his brothers, as touching thoſe things which his father had committed to his charge, he heard the Philiftine blaſpheming and railing vpon the Hebrew armie, and waſt herewith ſo greatly moued, that turning himſelfe vnto his brothers, he told them that he was readie and addreſſed to fight hand to hand againſt that enemy. But Eliab the elder brother reproved him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardie then became his age, and that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to retune vnto his father, and intend his flockes. David for the reuerence he bare vnto his brother departed from thence, and meeting with certaine ſouldiers, ſaid vnto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud challenger: which they preſently ſignified vnto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeeke him out. Now when he came before his preſence, he asked him what he intended to doe: O king (ſaid he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy feare ouermaſter thee. For I am hee that will abate the pride of the enemy, and encounter and enter combate with him: and how great and high ſouer hee be, how elate and fierce ſouer he ſlew himſelfe, I will ſubdue him, and turne his terror to deriſion: and ſo much the more ſhall thy glory, and the honour of thy armie be enhanced, by how much ſo great and expert a man at armes ſhall hee ſubdued by a young man, and an vnexperienced ſouldier. Saul amazed at his hardineſſe, and great courage, yet notwithstanding ſuſpecting him by reaſon of his yeares; told him that he was too feeble, to encounter a man ſo expert in feates of armes: whereunto David made this anſwere. That which I promiſe you (my ſoueraigne) is vnder the aſſurance which I haue in God, which heretofore I haue prooued, and the ſuccow which at other times I haue receiued at his hands. For while I fed my fathers flockes, I redeemed a lambe that was rauſhed out of my fold, out of the lions lawes; and catching the wilde beaſt by the taile, that with open mouth aſſaulted and fought to deuour me, I bet him to the ground, and ſlue him. Neither with leſſe ſucceſſe inuaded I a Beare that ſet vpon my flocke; and as light doe I ſet by this monſter alſo: who vomiting out his ſlaunderous raylings both againſt God, and men, ſhall neither eſcape the diuine arme of iuſtice which he ſo wickedly prouoketh, neither ſlie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him.

So

A So much preuailed this forward readineſſe in the young man, that the king beſeeching Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſhed him with a royall armour, a ſword and a helmet, and ſent him forth to the battell. But David feeling the weight of his armour, and ſeeming rather to be loaded then defended with the ſame, ſaid vnto him: Let theſe armes (O King) ſerue to in- cloſe and defence thy bodie, who art able to beare them, and ſuffer me I beſeech thee, who am thy ſervant, to fight according to mine owne fantaſie. He therefore laid by his armour, and tooke a ſtaffe in his hand, and ſue ſtones which he gathered on the bankes of the torrent, which hee put in his ſcrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemy. Now when the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorne he asked him whether hee thought him to beea dogge, that hee thus came forth to fight with him, with weapons ſit to ſcarre dogges. Nay (ſaid David) I eſteeme thee worſer then a dogge: which ſo much peruerſed Goliaths patience, that he curſed the name of his God, thundring out threats, that he would caſt out his carcaſſe to be deuoured by the beaſts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But David anſwered, Thou commeſt againſt me with thy ſword, thy iavelin, and cures: but contrariwiſe, I march out againſt thee vnder the warrantie and protection of God, who ſhall deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole armie, for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy bodie to the dogs whom thou reſembleſt, and all men ſhall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrewes, and that our armes and forces are the cares that it pleaſeth him to haue of vs, and that all other furniture of warre is vnprofitable, except it be aſſiſted by God. The waight of the Philiftines armes hindred him from marching readily: ſo that he marched foote by foote towards David, contemning him, and truſting that he ſhould kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, as alſo becauſe hee was young, and tender in yeares.

CHAP. XI.

The ſingle combate betwixt David and Goliath, and the ſlaughter of the Philiftines that followed after.

David ſet forward to make head againſt his enemy, being aſſiſted by a companion whom he ſaw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the ſtones, which hee had gathered on the bankes of the torrent, out of his ſcrip, and hauing fitted it in his ſling, hee forced it againſt Goliath, and gaue him ſuch a ſtroke on the forehead, that hee peared him to the verie braine: ſo that Goliath fell downe ſodainly dead, and he running vpon him as hee lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his owne ſworde: for he himſelfe had none. As ſoone as he was ſtrooken downe, diſcomfiture and flight ſeized all the armie of the Philiftines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed warrior amongſt them ouerthrowne and ſlaine, they began to ſuſpect the generall iſſue of their warre, and reſolued to retire from thence; ſo tooke they their flight in diſorder and confuſion, ſuppoſing by that meanes to deliuer themſelves out of dangers. But Saul and the whole armie of the Hebrewes ſallied out againſt them, with great ſhouts and cries; and in the purſuit made a great ſlaughter of them, and draue them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Aſcalon. In this battell there died on the Philiftines ſide about thirtie thouſand, and the reſt that were hurt and wounded, were twiſe as many. Saul returning backe into his campe pillaged and burnt their tents: but David bore Goliaths head into his pavilion, and hung his ſworde in the tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame vnto God. But Saul afterward conceiued a priuie hatred againſt David, vpon this occaſion which enſueth: For where as hee returned triumphant like a conquerour with the armie, and the women and maidens ſinging and dauncing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meeete him: The women ſung, that Saul had ſlaine diuers thouſands of the Philiftines; and the virgins anſwered, that David had ſlain diuerſen thouſands. Which when Saul vnderſtood, and ſaw that the leſſer reſtimonie of thouſands was referred to him, and that the ten thouſands were attributed to David, he ſuppoſed that after ſo glorious a renowne, there wanted nothing for David, except to be king. For which cauſe he began to feare and ſuſpect him: ſo that by reaſon of the feare he had of him, hee thought that he was too neere his owne perſon, and therefore from being one of the chiefeſt in authoritie about him, which was to be one of his chiefeſt commaunders and guard, hee made him captaine ouer a thouſand, rather reſpectiug his owne ſecuritie, then the others honour; to the intent that being often charged by incurſions of the enemy, hee might by ſome diſaſter be deprived of his life. But David hauing in all places the aſſiſtance of almighty God, returned alwayes with with good ſucceſſe and happie iſſue: ſo that for the excellencie of his valour, the people intirely loued him: and Sauls daughter alſo, that was about that time marriageable, began to bee inmourled with him, and ſo great and apparant was her affection towards Dauid, as the certaine notice thereof came vnto her fathers cares, who was fore diſpleaſed therewith; yet hoping by that meanes the ſooner to intrap him, hee gaue eare thereto with ſome ſhew of allowance, and told them who diſcouered their loues vnto him, that he would willingly giue him his daughter to wife, vnder pretence that the enioying of her might bee the meanes of his vtter ouerthrow.

For ſaid he I am content to giue him my daughter in marriage, vnder that condition, that hee bring me fix hundred enemies heads; and hee deſirous to get ſo high and famous a reward, and in like ſort to obtaine honor, by an act both ſo dangerous and admirable, will vndertake the execution thereof, and ſhall be ſlaine by the hands of the Philiftines, and that intention which I H haue conceived againſt him, ſhall ſucceed according to mine owne hearts deſire: for I ſhall bee deliuered of him, in ſending him out of the world, not by my meanes, but other mens handes.
Further, he charged his Courtiers to ſound and ſeeke out Dauids reſolution, and how hee was af-fectioned towards marriage: who beganne to deuiliſh with him, telling him that the king bare him a moſt intire fauor, and that the people admired him, and how they would procure him the marriage of the kings daughter. Whereunto Dauid replied: Thinke you it to be a ſmall matter to be ſon in law vnto the king? for my ſelfe I eſteeme or herwiſe, conſidering in eſpeciall mine own baſe condition, who haue neither reputation nor any honourable qualitie. When Sauls ſeruants had related vnto him what anſwere Dauid had made them: Tell him ſaid he that I neither want goods nor preſents (for that were to expoſe my daughter to ſale, and not to match her with a husband.) I ſeeke for a ſonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue; ſuch as is maniſeſt and apparant in thee: and my deſire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou giue me neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers houſe; but the puniſhment of the Philiftines, and fix hundred of their heads, which ſhall be the moſt deſired and accepted dower thou canſt preſent me with. My daughter alſo requeſteth aboue all the dowers, that may accrew vnto her by order of law, to be married to ſuch a man that is ſo ennobled and famous by the ouerthrow of his enemies.

When theſe words were reported vnto Dauid, he was verie ioyfull, thinking that Saul ſpoke ſincerely of this affinitie: and without delay, or taking counſaile or deliberation, whether the thing were eaſie or impoſſible for him to execute, hee incontinently departed with his com-panie to go and find out the enemy, and execute the condition, vnder which the marriage was promiſed him. For it was God that made all things eaſie and poſſible to Dauid: for after he had ſlaine diuerſe of them, and cut off fix hundred of their heads, he returned and preſented them to the king, and in conſideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

deliuered his daughter Michol vnto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that mind.
For perceiving that Dauid was gracious in Gods ſight, and in good reputation amongst the people, he was afraid of him: and being vnable to conſeale his feare: hee had conceived, to bee deprived of two things of ſuch conſequence, as were his kingdom and life, hee reſolved to kill Dauid; giuing commiſion to his ſonne Jonathan, and diuerſe other of his ſeruants to execute the

he had of Dauid in times paſt, ſought to hurt Dauid, not in any ſlight ſort, but by indangering his life: and on the other ſide being ſingularly affected towards him, and reſpecting of his vertue, he communicated the ſecret and deliberation of his father with him, counſelling him to haue fences, yet ought he to obtaine a deſerued pardon. I will tell thee afterwards ſaid he) what my

How the King practiſed to murder Dauid.

The next day after, Jonathan came vnto Saul, and finding him merrie and well diſpoſed, Jonathan re-kneweth vp vnto his father the good de-ſerts of Dauid, praying him to pacifie his diſpleaſure againſt him.
Hee began to ſpeak vnto him to this effect, as concerning Dauid. In what fault (O Father) either great or ſmall haue you found Dauid guiltye, that you haue ordained & commanded him to be done to death? who is ſuch a man as for the conſeruation of your own perſon, hath been very profitable, & beſides that hath preiudiced the eſtate of the Philiftines, & inhaunced the honour of the people of the Hebrews, and hath deliuered them from that diſgrace and mockery, wherewith they haue bene curbed for the ſpace of forty yeares: ſo that he onely hath dared, and

How hardly Dauid eſcaped the ambuſhes that were often laid for him by the king, yet hauing him twice at aduantage and in his power, would not murder him.

About the ſame time, whileſt the Philiftines led forth their armie anew againſt the He-brewes, Saul ſent out Dauid againſt them accompanied with his forces, who encountering them ſlew a great number of them, & returned vnto the king with a great victory.
But Saul entertained him not, both as he deſerued, and the happy exploit atchieued by him did merit; but deſpited and enuied his good actions & honorable deſerts, as if Dauids happy ſucceſſe had bin Sauls diſaduantage and preiudice. But at ſuch time as the euill ſpirit returned anew and both leiſed and vexed him, hee lodged him in his owne chamber where he lay, and hauing at that time a lute in his hand, he commanded him to play on his harp & to ſing hymnes. Now whi-leſt Dauid executed that his commandement, Saul ſtretching out his arme threw his dart at him: but Dauid foreſeeing it, auoided the ſtroke, and fled into his owne houſe, where he ſoourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the king ſent out certaine of his ſeruants to watch his houſe for ſeaſe leaſt he ſhould eſcape, to the end that the next day being drawn and appearing in iudgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, Dauids wife and Sauls daughter, hauing intelligence of her fathers intention, ran vnto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he & ſhe were, who without his preſence neither could nor would liue any longer. Beware ſaid ſhe) leaſt the ſunne finde thee in this place, for hee ſhall no more behold thee therein, and vnder the couering thereof, she hid the liuer of a new slaughtered Kid: and when G her father had sent the next morning to apprehend David, she answered that hee had bene sicke all the night long: then discovering the bed that was covered, she gaue them to vnderstand that David was laid therein, making them touch the couerlet vnder which the liuer stirred, and made them beleue that the liuer that lay there was David, who panted & breathed very hardly. Which being signified vnto Saul, hee commanded that hee should bee brought vnto him in that estate wherein he was, because he was resolved to put him to death. But when Sauls messengers were arrived and returned thither, and had discovered the bed, they perceived Michols subtiltie, and went and certified the king thereof: who reproued her very grievously for that shee had saved his aduersarie, and deceived her father. But shee defended her selfe with words full of good appearance, saying, that David had threatened to kill him, and how for that cause, and by the impulsion of feare, she was drawn and induced to aide and saue him. For which cause shee ought to be pardoned, since by constraint and not of set purpose shee had furthered his escape. For (said shee) I thinke that you seeke not so greedily after the death of your enemy, as to preferre the same before the safetie and securitie of your daughter. On these perswasions Saul pardoned his daughter.

David deliuered from this perill came vnto the Prophet Samuel to Ramatha, and tolde him what ambushes the king had laid for him, & how hardly he had escaped death by the stroke of his lauelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, hee had alwaies shewed himselfe obedient; againe how hee had neuer ceased to warre vpon his enemies, and had by Gods assistance bene fortunate in all things, which was the cause that Saul was so displeased with him. The Prophet, informed of Sauls iniustice, forsooke the Citie of Ramath, and led David to a certaine place called Galbath where he remained with him. But as soone as Saul was informed that David was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certaine souldiers to lay hands on him; and bring him vnto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were seised with the spirit of God and began to prophesie. Which when Saul understood, hee sent out others, who had the like encounter with the first. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company prophesie likewise, he was in the end so much despised, that hee came thither in his owne person. And when he drew neere the place before that Samuel saw him, hee made him prophesie; so that Saul comming towards him, was seised by abundance of the spirit: so that hee was rauished out of himselfe, and hauing depoyled himselfe of his raiment, hee lay K prostrate all the day and the night long in the presence both of Samuel and David. David departed from thence, and went vnto Jonathan, to whom he complained of those ambushes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithstanding hee had neuer committed either iniurie or fault against his father, yet did he earnestly pursue him to put him to death. Jonathan perswaded him that he should neither rashly suspect these things, nor bee ouer-credulous in those reports which perhaps might be brought vnto him, but that he should trust him onely; who was assured that his father intended no euill against him: For if he had, he would haue told him, who is neuer wont to act any thing without his counsell. But David swore vnto him that it was so, and besought him that he would beleue his vnfaigned assertions, whereby hee might the more easily procure his securitie, least contemning his words, & supposing them to bee fained and frivolous, L he should by his death be ascertained of the sight and truth thereof: For hee assured him that his father for that cause did not communicate his counsailes with him, because hee was assured of the loue and friendship that was betwene them. Jonathan sore aggrieved, that David was so perswaded, and Sauls intention was such, asked him what hee desired at his hands, or where he might shew him friendship. David said vnto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou maiest, and refuse mee in nothing. Now to morrow is the first day of the month, in which I was accustomed to dine at the kings table, and if thou thinkest good I will depart out of the Citie into the field; where I will lie hidden: if he aske for me, thou shalt say I am gone into the country of Bethleem where my tribe solemnizeth a feast; thou shalt certify him also that thou hast giuen me leave. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinary wish that friends vse to such as go about: M ney, know that he hath no hidden rancor, nor secret malice conceived against me, but if hee answer otherwise, it shall be an assured testimonie that hee complotteth some mischief against me, and this shalt thou ascertaine me of, as both becommeth my present calamitie, and our mutual friendship, which by vowed oath thou being my Lord, hast plighted with me who am thy seruant. And if thou thinke me vnworthy of this fauour & iniurious towards thy father, without expecting the sentence of his iustice, kill me now at this present with thine owne sword. A grievously strooke Jonathan to the heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request, assisting him to certify him if he any waies could perceiue that his father was affected towards him; and to the intent hee might the better be beleued, he caused him to walke forth with him into the cleare and open ayre, and there swore vnto him that hee would not pretermitt any thing that might tend to the conseruation of David. For (said he) that God that stilleth and moderateth all things in this wide spread vniuersie, and who before I speake, knoweth my mind: he I say, shall beare witnesse of that accord which shall be ratified betwene thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father till such time as I know and haue conceived his intention, and that I haue entred into his secrets to know what sickness his soule is seized with; and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceale it from thee, but giue thee notice thereof, be it that hee be appeared or displeased against thee. The same God knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be assistant vnto thee, as also he is at this present: and that hee abandon thee neuer, but make thee Lord ouer thine enemies, yea though it were my father, or my selfe. Onely remember mee in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children, and be as favorable towards them, as I am affected to theeward at this present. After hee had sworn this oath, hee dismissed David; willing him to conceale himselfe in a certaine place of the Plaine, where he ordinarily exercised himselfe: For that as soone as he understood his fathers mind, hee would returne thither with his Page, and if (said he) hauing shot three shafts at the marke, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them backe againe to me, for that they are right before him, know thou that thou art to expect no euill from my father: but if thou hearest mee speake to the contrarie, thinke thou that my father is incensed and misaffected towards thee; yet howsoeuer it happen, I will doe my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwaies then we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such times as thou shalt obtaine thy happy daies, and be thou fauorable vnto my children. David being confirmed by Jonathans promises, retired himselfe to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnitie of the new moone, after the king was purified according to the custome, he fate downe to take his repast: Now when his sonne Jonathan was set on his right side, and Abner the General of his Armie on the left, Saul perceived Davids place was void, and spake not a word, supposing that hee was absent from that company by reason he was not purified since hee had the companie of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new Moone that he was absent likewise, he asked his sonne D Jonathan why Iesses sonne both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at that feast; who answered him that he was gone into his countrie (prosecuting the storie, according as it had bene concluded betwene them) alluding that his tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assit the same. Further (said he) he inuited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assit the feast: for you know how entirely I loue the man. At this time knew Jonathan the displeasure his father had conceived against David, and perceived most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceale his choler, but began to raile vpon his sonne, calling him rebell and his enemy, and companion and confederate with David, telling him that hee shewed reuerence neither to him, nor to his mother, since hee was so minded: and that hee would not beleue, but that as long as David liued, their royall estate should be alwaies in continuall disturbance: He commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do iustice vpon him. Jonathan replied, What euill hath David committed, for which hee should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choler in words and disgraces, but taking hold of a lauelin, he assaulted him and would haue slaine him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained by his friends. At that time did Jonathan clearely discouer the hatred that Saul bare towards David, and how instantly & furiously he sought his ruine, since welny for Davids sake he had slaine his owne & eldest son. Then did Jonathan withdraw himselfe from the banquet, seeing with how little profit he had pleaded, and so much was hee grieved that he ceased not to weepe, & the rather since welny his father had vnkindly slaine him: And seeing that David was adiudged to die, hee passed all the night long without sleepe, and about the day F spring hee departed out of the Citie to the appointed field, making a shew that he walked out to take his exercise; but indeed it was to discouer vnto his friend the intent which his father had, according as it was couenanted betwene them. After that Jonathan had done that which he had promised, and sent backe his Page into the Citie, he came vnto David both to see and speak with him in priuate: who as soone as he perceived him, cast himselfe prostrate at Jonathans feet, calling him the conseruer and maintainer of his life. But Jonathan lifted him vp from the earth; so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutuall kisses for a long time

David flying from the king and the war which he made against him, rettyred himselfe to the citie of Nob to Achimelech the priest: who seeing David come alone vnto him without either friend or seruant, was amazed; and desired to know the cause why he thus wandred without any attendance. David told him that the king had sent him about some secret execution, which might not be communicated vnto him, although he were desirous to know it: and as touching my seruants (said he) I haue commanded them to attend mee in this place. He further required him, H that he would giue him such things as were necessarie for his voyage that he had to make, where- in he might performe the part of a friend, in succouring him at such time as he had neede of him. Which when he had condescended vnto, he requested him to giue him some armes, either sword or iauelin (now in this place was there present one of Sauls seruants that was called Doeg, a Syrian by nation, and the pastor of the kings mules.) The Priest answered him, that he had no such thing by him except it were Goliaths sword, which he himselfe had hanged in the Tabernacle and dedicated vnto God, at such time as he slew the Philistine. David hauing gotten it, fled out of the countrey of the Hebrewes, and went vnto Geth, a countrey of the Philistines, wherein Achis was king. There being knowne by the kings seruants, hee was discouered and nored to bee that David, that had slaine many thousand Philistines. David fearing to bee put to death by him, I and suspecting least hee should fall into the same daunger which hee had escaped by flying from Saul, counterfeited himselfe to be foolish and mad: so that the some frothed and issued out of his mouth; and counterfeited in all things so cunningly, that he made the king of Geth beleue most stedfastly that hee was beforsed and frenzie in his sicknesse. For which cause the king was wroth with his seruants in that they had brought him a mad man, and commanded them with all expedition that might bee, to driue him out of his countrey. Hauing in this sort escaped out of the countrey of the Geths, he transported himselfe into the tribe of Iuda, and being in the caue of Adullam, hee sent vnto his brothers to let them vnderstand that he was there, who came vnto him with all their linage: and diuers others that either were in need or stood in feare of Saul, re- sorted vnto him, saying, that they were ready to performe whatsoever hee should comānd them: K all which amounted to the number of foure hundredth or thereabouts. David therefore being thus assured, by reason of the succours and forces that came vnto him, dislodged from thence & went to the king of the Moabites, beseeching him that hee would bee pleased to entertaine his father and mother in that countrey, vntill such time as hee vnderstood what should bee the issue or end of his affaires. The king vouchsafed him this fauour, and did them great honour all the time they were in his countrey. And as touching David, he hauing receiued instructions by the com- mandement of the Prophet to abandon the desert, and to sojourne in the tribe of Iuda: he obeyed him; so that comming to Saron, hee made his abode in that place. But when Saul had vnder- stood that David had bene seene with a number of men, hee fell into an extraordinary feare and trouble of minde: for knowing both the vnderstanding and courage of the man, he thought L inwardly with himselfe that hee would attempt no action that was not great, and such a one as might not onely endanger his kingdome, or at leastwise breed him much difficultie & labor. For which cause, assembling his friends and captaines, and those of his tribe in Gaba where he kept his royall court, there sitting in a place called Aror, where all his honourable and ciuill ma- gistrates, with the rest of his captaines and souldiers enuironed him round about, hee spake vnto them after this manner. Beloued friends, I know that you can beare witnesse of my boun- tie, and how I haue aduanced some of you to honours, signiories and possessions, and haue pre- ferred you to the chiefe dignities and prerogatiues amongst the people. Now would I know of you whether you hope or expect from the sonne of Iesse greater bounty and larger benefits, then I haue bestowed vpon you: I know that all of you are confederated with him, and that my sonne Jonathā likewise is of the same faction, and hath perswaded you to follow and fauour him. For I am not ignorant both of the othes and couenants that are past twixt him and David, and am wel assured that he is both a counsellor and assister vnto him in whatsoever he vndertaketh against me: yet are none of you touched with these cares; but intending your owne quiet, you expect the euent of these matters.

When the king had spoken thus, there were none of the assistants that replied: onely Doeg the

A the Syrian master of the kings mules; arose and said: That hee had seene David in the Citie of Nob; who resorted to the high Priest Achimelech, to aske counsell of him as touching his affaires; that there he had receiued those things that were needfull to furnish him in his voyage, and Goliaths sword likewise; and how he was safely conducted towards the place whither hee pretended to go. Hereupon Saul sent for the high Priest and all his kinred, and spake thus vnto him. What wrong or displeasure haue I done thee, that thou hast entertained the sonne of Iesse? and hast deli- uered him victuals and armes; to him, I say, that seeketh but the meanes to possesse himselfe of my kingdome? What answer hast thou made him: as touching those demands hee presented thee, in regard of his future fortunes? for thou hast not been ignorant that he fled from mee, and what hatred he beares against both me & my family. The high Priest denied none of these things. B but freely confessed that he had deliuered him such things as were reported, but not with an in- tent to gratifie David, but the king: for I entertained him (said he) not as thine enemy, but as thy faithfull minister and tribune, nay which is more, as thy sonne in law, and such a one as was tied vnto thee by neere alliance. For who would haue thought, that he, who was intitled to so much honour by thee, should be thine enemy: nay rather, who would not esteeme him for thy fauour- ite and neere friend? And whereas hee asked counsell of me as touching Gods will, this is not the first time, I haue answered him; but oft & many other times haue I aduised him. And where as he said, that hee was sent by thee about some hastie and secret business, should I haue refused him those supplies which he required at my hands, I might haue bin iudged rather to haue done ini- rie to thy maiestic then to him. For which cause thou art not to suspect or thinke euill of me; or if C thou hast receiued any aduersitment, that David at this time intendeth some trouble & inno- uation against thee, oughtst thou to thinke that by reason of the curtesie I haue shewed him, that I either fauor him or maintain him against thee: for what I bestowed, I employed as on thy friend; thy sonne in law and thy tribune; and whatsoever curtesie he receiued from me, it was done vnto thee. Notwithstanding all these iust allegations, yet could Saul be no waies induced to beleue them: but contrariwise, his vehement feare made him suspect the true iustifications of Achime- lech: so that he commanded certaine armed men that were about him, that they should put both him and all his family to the sword. But when they held it no lesse then sacrilege, to violate by violent death such as were men consecrated vnto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to D perpetrate the slaughter, who ioyning to himselfe certaine other sacrilegious and impious men, hee murdered Achimelech and all his race, who were in number three hundredth, thirtie and fve men. He further sent to Nob the citie of the Priests, and put all of them vnto the sword, neither sparing woman nor childe, nor hauing respect vnto any otherage, but consumed the whole Citie with fire, onely one sonne of Achimelech escaped, who was called Abiathar. All which befor- tuned according as God had foretold the high Priest Eli, saying, that by reason of the transgressi- on of his two sonnes, his posteritie should be extinguished.

This cruell and malicious act perpetrated by king Saul (in extinguishing all the race of the sacerdotall order, without compassion either of Infants, or reuerence of old age: this destru- ction of his of that Citie, which God had chosen to bee the countrey and common nuric of the Priests and Prophets, and which hee elected to be a receptacle and refuge of all that sort of men) E manifestly expresseth and declareth vnto all men, how depraued and corrupt the minds of men are. For so long as they are humble, and limited by a base and priuate estate, because they nei- ther dare nor can haue libertie to giue scope to their vnbridled natures: they seeme to bee good and iust men; and make shew of a wonderfull studie of iustice, accompanying the same with pietie, and are perswaded that God is present in all our actions: finally, that hee beholdeth all our cogitations. But no sooner haue they attained to power and empire, laying aside their former and reformed manners, and taking vpon them as it were in a stage play, both a new ha- bite and another personage, but they are deuoured in all audaciousnes and insolencie, and contempt of both diuine and humane lawes. And when as to overcome their enuie they had most need of pietie and iustice; and when as not onely all their actions, but also their wills are expo- F sed to all mens eyes: then most of all, as if either God dissembled, or feared their power, they exercise their tyrannies vpon their subiects; and whatsoever they decree, either thorow vaine feare, hatred or vnreasonable fauour, that suppose they both to be ratified by men, and allowed by God: being altogether depriued of either respect or reason of those things that are to come. For whatsoever they be that spend their many & vnexhausted labours in their seruice, those doe they first preferre: and afterwards when they haue loaden them with the burthen of dignities, they through enuie not onely depriue of those dignities, but thorow slander also doe oftentimes opresse them, not considering how deservfully they oppresse, but onely giving credit without proofe to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage; nor on those they ought to punish, but those that may most easily be depressed and overthrowne. The manifest example hereof appeareth vnto vs in Saul the sonne of Cis: who after the gouernement of the nobilitie was extinct, and the supreme magistracie of iudges was dissimuled, being the first created king of the Hebrewes; onely for that hee suspected Achimelech by hee slew three hundred priests and prophets, and after he had slaine them destroyed their citie with fire; and as much as in him lay, depriued the high temple of God, nor onely of priests but sacred ministers; and after to hideous a slaughter, neither spared their countrey nor any of their offspring to be left alive. But Abigail Achimelechs sonne, who onely escaped with life amidst his slaughtered family, flying vnto Dauid, declared vnto him both the overthrow of his family and the death of his father. Dauid answered him, that hee expected no less then that which happened; for such times as hee espied Doeg there, who as his minde gaue him would not faile to reprove and scandaize Achimelech to Saul; yet tooke hee on him that the misfortune hapned vnto his friend by his meanes: hee therefore praised him to remaine with him, because hee could not be concealed or secured in any place better then with himselfe.

About the same time, Dauid vnderstanding that the Philistines made a road into the countrey of Cilla, and preied the same, determined to assault them, if after the Prophet had asked counsell of God, he should bee by the oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordinglie falling out, hee sallied out accompanied with his friends, and serijon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recovered a verie rich prey, and gaue convey to the Cillians, till in such times as they had safely gathered in and housed all their corne and fruit. The rumour of this his exploit was presently brought vnto Saul: for this noble act and happy execution was not onely not shut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renowne thereof was dispersed euery where both in other mens eares as also in the kings; and both the action and the author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very ioyfull to heare that Dauid was in Cilla, and said thus: God hath deliuered him into my hands, by inforcing him to shut vp himselfe within a citie inclosed with wals, gates, and bars: whereupon he sodainly gaue commandement that all the people should march against Cilla, and besiege the same, and surpris or kill Dauid.

But Dauid hauing intelligence hereof, and aduertised by God that if hee staid among the Cillians, they would deliuer him into the hands of Saul, he tooke with him his foure hundred men, and retired himselfe from the Citie into the desert, and encamped on a defended hill called Engaddi: so that the king being aduertised that he was fled from the Cillians, ceased to issue out in armes against him. From thence Dauid departed to a certaine place of the Ziphians, where Jonathan Sauls sonne met with him, and after he had embraced him, he exhorted him to be of good cheere, and to conceiue an assured hope of future good fortune, and not to giue place to his present miseries, by reason that hee should obtaine the kingdome, and should haue the whole power of the Hebrewes subiect vnto him; but that such things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great traualles: and after they had once more renewed the oth of mutual and lasting amitie and faith betweene them, during all the time of their liues, calling God to witnesse with imprecations against him, that should contradict or in any sort change those conuentions; Jonathan left Dauid somewhat eased in heart, and disburdened of his conceiued feare, and that done, returned to his owne home. But the Ziphians incending to gratifie Saul, told him that Dauid was amongst them, and promised him to deliuer him prisoner into his hands, if so be hee would issue out against him: insomuch as if hee would seize all the streights of the countrey, it should bee impossible for him to flee into any other place. The king praised their forwardnesse, and promised them to require their loyalty, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection, and withall sent out certaine men to seeke out Dauid, and to beake ouer the Forrest, promising them that shortly hee would follow after them. Thus did the gouernours & princes of the Ziphians offer themselves vnto the king to search out M and apprehend him, expresing their affection therein, not onely in outward shew, but also with their whole power labouring what they might, that surprisng him they might deliuer him to the kings hands. But their iniust desire had as infortunate successe: who being to incur no perill by concealing him from pursuit, promised to betray into the kings hands thorow adulation and avarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his enemies. For Dauid being made priuie to their malice, and ascertained of the kings approche, leaving those

The year of the world, 2883. before Christs Nativity, 1081. Saul pursueth Dauid, and hauing circumented him, had take him, had not hee received newes that hee reuoked him.

A those narrow straights wherein they then incamped, escaped to a certaine rock, which is situate in the desert of Simon: Neither desired Saul to pursue him, for knowing by the way that he had overcome the straits, he came to the other side of the rock, & Dauid had surely both been taken and circumvented, had not the king been reuoked by fearfull tidings, which assured him that the Philistines had forcibly entered and spoiled his kingdome. For hee thought it more conuenient to reuenge himselfe on those his hostile & sworn enemies, & to giue succour to his country & people, being ready to be spoiled & wasted, then vnder desire to lay hands on a priuate enemy; to betray both his country and himselfe to their words; and thus was Dauid saved beyond all expectation, and retired himselfe to the straights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulst the Philistines, certaine newes was brought him that Dauid dwelt in the straights of Engaddi: whereupon he presently taking with him three thousand of the choicest men in all his armie, hee ledde them speedily to the forenamed place, and being not farre from thence, hee perceived neere vnto the high way, a deep, hollow, large, long & open caue, whereas Dauid with his foure hundred men might be hidden; and defended himselfe alone into the caue to disburthen this necessity of nature. This was presently discovered by one of Dauids followers, who told him that G.O.D. had presented him a fit opportunity to reuenge him on his enemy, & counselled him to cut off Sauls head, and to discharge himselfe thereby of much trouble and torment; who aiming and finding him out, onely cut off the lap of the vesture wherein Saul was attired; and presently therupon reported himselfe, saying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by election had raised to the estate of Maieftic and Empire. For (said he) although he be against toward me, yet ought I not to be iniurious towards him.

But when Saul was issued out of the caue, Dauid went but after, and cried with a loud voice; beseeching Saul that he would giue him audience: who turning back vnto him, he cast himselfe prostrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the custome; and spake after this manner; How vawordly is it for thee, O King, that opening thy eares to scandalous backbiters, and giuing trust and credit to vaine and loose men, thou suspectest thy most tried friends, whom thou rather oughtest to iudge by their sincera and vpright actions: for words may be either false or true, but the mind may be discovered by none more apparant arguments then by ments actions: as at this present thou manifestest, whether thou hast rashly believed them, that make mee guilty before thy Maieftie of that crime, that was neuer yet so much as thought vpon, and haue to much exasperated thee against me, that day & night thou thinkest on nothing more then my destruction. Seest thou not now how vaine thy opinion is, whereby they perswade thee, that I am an enemy of thy house, and earnestly desirous of thy death. Or with what eies thinkest thou doth God behold thy cruelty, who art quierst his death, who hauing occasion and opportunity offered him to be reuenged on thee, spareth thy life, whose life were it in thy hands were assuredly lost: for as easily might I haue cut off thy head as this lap of thy garment (and therewithall, in confirmation of his words, he shewed it him) yet did I forbear this iust reuenge, yet contrariwise art not thou afraid to exercise thy vniust tyrannies against me. But God shal beare witnesse hereof, & shall approue which of vs both are of more peaceable behaviours: Saul amazed to see how strangely his life had been preferred, and raiused to consider the naturall mildnesse and moderation in

Dauid, began to weep, and Dauid wept also: but Saul said that he had greater cause to lament then he. For, said he, by thy meanes haue I receiued many benefits; and thou at my hands hast been repaid with infinite iniuries. This day hast thou testified that thou remainest the ancient iustice of item him that when he hath obtained the kingdome, he would be favourable to his family. Saul acknowledged his malice & Dauids innocencie, & requested him that when he hath obtained the kingdome, he would be favourable to his family. The same time died Samuel the prophet, a man who by his merit was in great estimation amongst the Hebrewes, the famous testimonie of whose vertue, and the peoples obseruation towards him, was expressed in this, in that they celebrated his funeral, and set out his sepulcher with great pompe: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented him many daies, not after the manner of a common or foraine miserie, but as if each one of them had in particular a preiudice and losse to lament for. For, hee was a man that was naturallie framed to all iustice and goodnesse, and for these his vertues most acceptable vnto God. Hee gouerned gouerned the people after the death of Eli the high Priest, first in his owne person for the space of XII twelue yeeres, and afterwards during the raigne of Saul eighteene yeeres, whose death hapned (as I said) about this time. But in those places where Dauid at that time remained, there was a certain Ziphian in a towne called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattell. For hee had a troupe of three thousand sheepe, and a heard of a thousand Goats. On these Dauid commaund his people to commit no waste, neither thorow desire, nor necessitie, nor hope of concealement, they should doe him any hurt. Charging them moreover, that they should offer no wrong vnto any man, because that to violate and take another mans goods, was both vnlawfull and wicked, and contrarie to Gods commandement. Hee instructed them in this sort, imagining with himselfe, that he should gratifie a good man, and such a one as deserued to be in like sort fauoured: but Nabal (for such was his name) was a rude and curritish person, leading his life in hunting. Yet had he a wife that was good, wife and faire.

To this Nabal Dauid did send tenne of his seruants about the time of his sheepe-shearing, both to salute him, as also to wish him all good, and to beseech God; that for diuers yeeres hee would graue him grace to doe the like. Meane while he requested him, that he would impart vnto him somewhat of that which was in his power, when as his shepherds could informe him, that hauing long time remained in the desert, wee haue, said they, bene so farre off from dooing your flocks any harme, as we haue rather seemed to bee their shepherds and keepers: they promised him likewise, that whatsoeuer curtesie he should shew vnto Dauid, he should bestow it on a mindfull and thankfull personage. Thus spake the messengers vnto Nabal: but hee answered them very discourteously, and rudely, demanding of them what that Dauid was; and being informed that he was the sonne of Iesse: Now, said he, these fugitiues and slaues forsaking their Maisters, liue proudly and insolently.

Dauid, hearing of this report, was grievously displeased, and commaunded foure hundred of his men to take vp their weapons & follow him, commaunding two hundred to keepe the baggage (for at that time he had fixe hundred) and in this equipage marched hee forward against Nabal, swearing, that that very night he would vterly exterminate & roote out all his race, and ransacke all his riches. Neither was he onely displeased for that Nabal was ingratefull towards them, without respect of that humanitie which they had shewed towards him, & his; but also, for that without any cause of iniurie offered, he had iniured and outraged him in words.

In the meane while, certaine shepherds that attended Nabals cattell, told their Mistresse their Maisters wife, that Dauid hauing lent vnto her husband to requite some small courtesie, had not onely obtained nothing, but also receiued insupportable iniuries, whereas till that day he had suffered his flocks to be vntouched: telling her that that insolencie of their Lord might breed them all much woe and miserie. Which when Abigal heard (for so was the woman called) she loaded diuers Assees with all sorts of presents (without making any motion to her husband, who was so drunke that he was insensible) and went towards Dauid. As therefore she descended the straights of the mountaine, Dauid encountered her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with foure hundred men: As soone as Abigal perceiued him, she leaped from her Steed, & falling vpon her face, she prostrated her selfe before him, beseeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was answerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal signifieth follie: the excused herselfe likewise, saying, that she saw none of them that were sent vnto her husband. For which cause she said, I beseech thee grant me pardon, and giue God thanks, that by my meanes hee hath hindered you from polluting your hands in innocent blood: for if thou remaine pure and innocent from bloodshed, he shall exact a punishment at their handes that haue hurt thee. For those misfortunes that attend on Nabal, shall fall on the heads of thine enemies: onely be thou fauourable vnto me in accepting these my humble presents, and for my sake remit that wrath which thou hast iustly conceiued against my husband: for clemencie and humanitie becommeth him whom the Fates haue destinated a kingdom. Dauid accepting her presents, gaue her an answer after this manner. Woman, said hee, GOD of his goodnesse hath this day brought thee hither, otherwise, thou haddest not liued, or scene the next morning. For I haue sworne, that this night I would overthrow thy house, and leaue none aliue of that vngratefull mans familie, who hath so contumeliously abused both me & mine: but now God hath put thee in mind wisely to preuent and pacifie my wrath.

As touching Nabal, although at this present hee bee exempted by thy meanes from punishment, yet shall hee not escape, but he shall lose his life: for his manners vpon an other occasion shall be the cause of his ruine. This said, he dismissed Abigal: who returning to her house, and finding ding her husband amidst his other companions, laden and ouerwhelmed in vaine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day when he was sober, certifying him thereof, he lost all his forces, and his body became mortified thorow the griefe hee conceiued at her words: so that some tenne daies after and no more, he departed out of this life. Which when Dauid vnderstood, he said that he was deservedly punished by God, because that his owne wickednesse was the cause of his punishment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who receiued the iniurie were vndistained with blood: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can escape Gods iudgement, and that all humane affaires are not rashly disposed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodnesse, and the wicked punished according to their wickednesse. He afterwards sent messengers to his wife, and caused her to come vnto him, to the intent he might marrie her, and take her to his wife. She answered the messengers, that she thought herselfe vnworthy to lie at his feet: notwithstanding she repaired vnto him with all her furniture and meanes whatsoeuer, and was married to Dauid, hauing obtained that degree of honour, both in that she was modest and iust, as also for that she was beautifull. Now Dauid had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the Citie of Gethla.

As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gaue her to wife at Liffa to the sonne of Phalti of the Citie of Gethla. After this, certaine Ziphians comming vnto Saul, told him that Dauid was returned againe into their country, and that if it pleased him to assist them, they might easily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul issued with three thousand armed men, and being surprised by night, he incamped in a certaine place called Sicelleg.

When Dauid was certified that Saul was issued forth against him, hee sent out certaine Spies, whom he gaue in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired; who ascertaining him that he was at Sicelleg; hee watched all that night without the knowledge of any of his followers, and went into Sauls campe, attended onely by Abisai his sister Saruais sonne, and Achimelech the Chittite.

Now whilst Saul was asleepe, & both his generall Abner with all his souldiers wholly deuoured in drowsinesse, Dauid entred into the kings campe; and although he knew the kings pavilion, by reason of his Iauelin that stood at the dore thereof, yet slew he him not, neither permitted hee Abisai, who was both willing and addressed to execute the slaughter, to performe it. But this hee said, that although the king were euill, yet notwithstanding it were a strange and vndecent thing for him, to slay him who was Godselected: for that it was Gods right to take reuenge on him, who had giuen the kingdom: and thus restrained hee the others vnbridled furie. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that hauing the opportunitie to slay him, hee had spared his life, hee bare away with him his Iauelin, and the pitcher of water that stood by Saul whilst hee slept, without the writing or knowledge of any of the campe: so much were they deuoured and overwhelmed with sleepe. He therefore departed thence in all assurance, hauing executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to doe. But after he had passed the riuer, and had attained the top of a mountaine, from whence hee might be easily heard, hee cried out to Sauls souldiers, and their generall Abner so strongly, that hee awaked them from their sleepe; and calling vpon Abner as well as the common sort of souldiers, the generall asked who it was that called him? to whom Dauid answered, It is I, the sonne of Iesse, your fugitiue: but, said he, how cometh it to passe, that thou who art so great, and in chiefe authoritie about the king, hast so small respect and guard of his person? Thy sleep is more pleasant vnto thee then thy watch for his conseruation. Assuredly this act of thine deserueth a capitall punishment, because thou neither hast discovered me, nor any others before we entred the campe, or approached the king. Seek for the kings Iauelin and his pitcher of water, and thou shalt perceiue in what great danger he hath bin, euen in the midst of you, without any notice or discouery of yours.

Saul perceiuing that it was Dauids voice, and conceiued how that beeing in his hands (whom he had surprisid in the depth of sleep, thorow the negligence of his guard) he had not slaine him, but pardoned him his life, although it iustly lay in his power to take his head from him: hee said, Saul praiseth Dauid, and willett him to without suspect of any euill to returne home vnto his house, because hee was periwaded, that hee loued not himselfe so much, as he was intirely affected by Dauid; notwithstanding that hee had courage, and pursued him, and for a long time past had chased him like a fugitiue, constraining him also by diuers afflictions and great torments of spirit, to be abandoned from his dearest parents & friends: his owne house, yea from Dauid himselfe, who might haue preferred him, and who had giuen him diuers demonstrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had been oftentimes preferred, whom notwithstanding norwithstanding he ceased not to pursue vnto the death, who contrariwise desired nothing more then his life. Hereupon David willed him to send some one of his seruants to bring back his iave-lin and pitcher of water: protesting that God should bee Iudge of both their natures, maimes & atcions, who knew that that day also he had spared his enemy, whom if he had so thought good, he might haue extinguisht.

Saul hauing this second time escaped frō *David*s hands, returned to his royall house. But Da-uid, fearing least if he sojourned in that place hee should be intrapped by Saul, though good to retire himselfe into the country of the Philistines and sojourn there. So that accompanied with six hundred men which he had with him, he transported himselfe to Achis king of Geth; one of their fiue Citties; who received him with all his people, and gaue him a place to dwell in: so that he abode in Geth, hauing with him his two wiues, Achimaas & Abigail. Which when Saul vn-derstood, hee made no more account to send or fallie out against him, because that two seuerall times he had been in dangier of his life, at such time as he pursued him to intrap him. David held it not conuenient to remaine in the Citie of Geth, & therefore requested the king of the Philistines, that sith he had courteously entertained him, it might please him likewise to do him the fauour to assigne him a certaine place in his country, where hee might make his habitation, because hee feared to be chargeable to him, if so be he remained in the citie. Achis assigned to him a village called Siceleg, which David after he obtained the kingdome, loued and honoured; holding that for his owne demaine, as his owne children & heires did after him. But hereof will wee speak in an other place. The time that David liued amongst the Philistines & in the towne of Siceleg, were foure moneths and twentie daies; during which time, by seuerall and secret excursions against the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he spoiled their country and returned back againe with a great bootie of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bondmen, least Achis by their means should haue intelligence of his enterprise. He sent likewise a part of the prey vnto the king, and when he demanded from whom he had taken the same, he answered that he had taken it from the Iewes that dwelt Southward and in the Plaine, perswading him that he had done no losse: so that Achis conceiued an opinion, that since David warred against his owne nation all the time of his abode with him, he would be a faithfull seruant vnto him. About the same time, the Philistines hauing determined to lead forth their armie against the Israelites, sent out to their allies, requiring them to assist them in that war, and to make their Rendezous at Renga, to the intent that beeing there assembled, they might dislodge and assaile the Israelites. Amongst their other auxiliarie companies, Achis had requested David to assist him, with his six hundred souldiers: who he promised him willingly to performe, telling him that the opportunitie was now come wherein hee might requite his curse, and the hospitalitie hee had shewed him. Achis promised him that after the victory, when as all things had succeeded according as he desired, hee would prefer David to the guard of his person; thinking by the promise of this honour and trust, he might augment *David*s forwardnesse and affection towards him.

Saul hearing

God.

B Ut Saul about this time had banished all Diuiners and Inchanters, and in generall, all such as were tellers of fortunes, reseruing none vvithin his countrey, but the Prophets.
VVhen as therefore hee understood that the Palestines were already vp in armes, and strongly encamped neere to the citie of Sonna, situate in the Plaine, hee marched forward and made head against them with all his forces. And as soone as he drew neer to the mountain of Gel-boa, he incamped right ouer against the enemy. Now when his army discovered their great forces, they were much discomfited, & no sooner beheld it but were amazed. Beeing therefore fore-troubled herewith, he sought counsell at Gods hands as touching the euent of the battell: & seeing M he returned him no answer, his hart more and more failed him, in that hee manifestly perceiued what sinister success would beide him, if God should not assist him in the conflict. He therefore comanded that they should search him out some Pythonissa or cunning enchantresse, who inuoca-ted and raised the spirits of the dead, to the end that by her meanes he might know if his vvarre should haue that successe which he pretended (for the Diuiners which gaue answer by the belly, which the Greekes call Engastrimythes, declare their aduentures to those that aske them.) And when

A when as by the report of a certaine familiar friend of his, hee was aduertised that there was such a one at Endor, vntoizing to his whole armie, and laying aside his royall habites, and attended onely by two, whom he esteemed for his most faithfull seruants, he repaired to Endor to this woman, requiring her to diuine and raise vp the spirit of him whom he should name. The woman denied, and said, that she ought not to contradict the kings edict, who had driuen out of his realme all such sort of Soothsaiers; telling him that hee did not well, that hauing receiued no wrong at her hands, he should thus found her, and seeke to bring her in laspe of the kings lawes, and cause her to bee punished. But Saul swore vnto her, that no man should knowe thereof, and that hee would not discover her diuination to others: briefly, that shee should incurre no danger thereby.

B After then that by his othes and protestations he had perswaded her, that she should haue no cause to feare, he commanded her to raise the spirit of Samuell. Shee not knowing what Samuell was, called him from hell, and he suddenly appeared. But when he perceiued that it was an honourable man, and of diuine semblance, she was fore troubled; and being wholly discomfited with this vision, she turned and said vnto the king: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no lesse. Saul confessed that it was he, and asked her for what cause she seemed to be so much troubled: She answered, that she saw a man ascend that resembled God. Saul commanded her to declare vnto him his shape, habite and age: and she gaue him to vnderstand that hee was a re-uerend old man, attired in the vestment of a high priest. By these marks Saul knew that it was Samuell: vvhereupon, prostrating himselfe on the earth, he adored and saluted him. The spirit of Samuell asked him for what cause hee had troubled and raised him. To whom hee complained and lamented that hee was enforced thereunto by necessitie: for that a grieuous host of his enemies were at hand, and that void of counsaile he was forsaken by God, hauing from him no prediction, either by prophecie or dreame: for which cause, said he, I made my recourse vnto thee, who hast alwaies had care both of mee and my fortunes. But Samuell, foreseeing that the kings death was hard at hand, answered him that it was in vaine for him to question with him, as touching those things that should happen, since thou knowest that thou art forsaken by God. Know therefore, said he, that David shall possesse the kingdome, and that it is hee that shall establish the estate by armes: but as concerning thy selfe, thou shalt lose both thy kingdome and thy life, because thou hast disobeyed GOD in thy vvarre against the Amalechites, & hast not obserued his commaundements, according as I foretold thee at such time as I was aliue. Knowe therefore, that thy people and host shall be discomfited by the enemy, and that both thou and thy sonnes shall be to morrow slaine in the battell, and be with me. When Saul vnderstood these things, hee became speechlesse, thorow the sorrow wherewith he was seased, and fell downe on the pavement, either for that his forces failed him thorow suddaine griefe, or for his want of meat; because that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchsafed his body any refectiō or sustenance.

At length, hardly recovering himselfe out of his swoon, the woman importuned him to receiue some sustenance; beseeching him to doe her that fauour in recompence of her vnexpected diuination; which though interdicted, she had aduentured to performe for his sake (before shee were ascertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in consideration whereof, shee prayed him, that seeing downe at the table, hee would refresh himselfe with some sustenance; to the end he might be the more able to return vnto his army. And although he resisted and vterly refused to eate, in that he had no appetite, and was vterly desperate; yet so effectually importuned shee, that finally she perswaded him to receiue some little nourishment. And whereas she had but one casse which she bred vp in her house with some particular care (for she was but a poore woman, and had no other riches) yet spared shee not to kill it, and dresse the flesh for Saul & his seruants.
Thus refected, Saul returned back againe into his camp. The curse of this woman deserueth to be praised: for although she knew that the king had prohibited her art, whereby both she and her family sufficiently maintained themselves: and although before that time shee had neuer scene Saul; yet so it is; that without remembering her that it was he by whom her art had bin condemned, shee entertained him not as a stranger, or like the man shee had neuer scene before; but had compassiō of him and comforted him, exhorting him to eate, although hee refused it, and presented him willingly and hartily with that little which she had in her pouerty. All which she did not vnder hope of recompence, or expected preferment (knowing well that Saul should shortly lose his life) nor according to the ordinarie course of men, that naturally honour those that haue bestowed some dignitie vpon them, and become seruiceable to those from whom they pretend to draw some profit hereafter. Shee therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth an excellent example of bountie, approouing that there is nothing more woorthy praise, then to re-lieue those that are in necessitie; neither any thing more becoming men, or whereby wee may obtaine Gods fauour and graces, better then by it. Thus much sufficeth at this present, in respect of this woman. But now me thinketh I shall doe well if I insert in this place, and in these my writings, another example both profitable to people and Nations, and in especiall an incitation to noble men, and such as are borne vnto glory, to follow vertue; which also shall expresse what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memorie, which ought to engender in the hearts of kings of Nations, and of Gouvernours of Common-weales, a singular desire and affection to addiect themselves to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertaine dangers, yea death it selfe; and teach them to endure all difficulties whatsoeuer, for their Countries cause. To which intent, the historie of Saul the king of the Hebrewes yieldeth me matter most incident to this purpose. For, although he knew that which should befall him, & that his death was at hand (according as it had bene foretold him) yet resolved he not to avoid the same; neither so loued hee his life, that for the conservation thereof, hee would deliuer vp his people into the hands of his enemies, nor dishonour his royall dignitie: but himselfe, with his children & all his household, exposed themselves to danger; thinking it more honourable to die with them in fighting for his subiects, and farre more expedient that his children should die like valiant men, then to leave them alieue in incertitude of estate whereinto they might fall, supposing that he should haue sufficient succours of his race, if he left behind him a perpetuall memorie & praise both of him and his. For which cause (in my opinion) he was both iust, strong and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like vnto him, I suppose that it becōmeth all men to giue testimonie of such a mans vertue. For I thinke that the Historians and ancient Writers, haue not worthily entituled them with the stile of valiant men, who attaining some worthy actions, attempted warre vnder assured hope of victorie and safetie, but they only that imitate Saul may deseruedly be called iust, praise-worthy, couragious, hardie, and contemners of all dangers. For what great thing is there in vndertaking the common hazard of warre, and tossed twixt hope and feare, to vse Fortunes fa-uour if the fawne vpon vs? But contrariwise, I account it an assured signe of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodnes, and knowing his death at hand, and assured in his cōflict, he is not affraid nor dismayd with such apprehensions, but seeketh out with an inuincible courage his most assured hazard.

This is the praise of our Saul, who is an example to all true louers of glory, that if they haue regard to leaue an honest memory to their posteritie, they should vpon the like opportunitie propose the same resolution to themselves: but in especiall Kings, who, by reason of the excellencie of their degree, ought not onely forbear to be euill, but also strue to be excellently vertuous. I could likewise say more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but least I should seeme too affectionate, I will returne to our former purpose.

After that the Philistines were thus encamped (according as hath been afore-spoken) and had numbered their forces according to their nations, king Darius, and gouernments, king Achis issued in the reuerend with his particular company, whom Darius followed, accompanied with his sixe hundred souldiers: whom when the Chieftaines of the Philistines beheld, they asked the King whence those Hebrewes came, and what their Leaders name was? Who answered them that it was David, who fled from Saul his maister, and how he had entertained him being fledde from him: againe, how David, in recompence of the good he had receiued at his hand, and to reuenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them against him. But the chieftaines blamed him, because he had chosen an enemy for his associate, counselling him to dismisse him, for feare lest he should secretly performe some strange stratageme against his confederates, because (said they) hee hath a fit opportunitie to reconcile himselfe to his Maister. They therefore willed him to send David backe with his sixe hundred souldiers, vnto the place which hee had giuen him to inhabite, because it was the same David of whom the damfels made songs, singing in praise of him, that hee had slaine many thousand Philistines. Vhen the king of Geth vnderstood these things, he thought their counsell to be laudable: for which cause, calling David vnto him, hee said vnto him; I protest vnto thee (said he) that I beare a most singular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cause I haue called thee out to assist vs in this battell; but our Captaines allow not of my resolution; for which cause, retire thy selfe to the place which I haue giuen thee, without concei-uing any euill suspicion of mee. There shalt thou be in garrison, to forestall the enemy from so-raging our country: and in so doeing, thou shalt partly assist vs in the warre. Herevpon, David departed vnto Siceleg, according as the king had commaunded him.

But

- A But during the time that David was in campe, and attended on the Philistines warre, the A-malechites arose and tooke Siceleg by force, and burned the Citie: and after they had gathered a great bootie both in that place, and in other villages of the Philistines country, they retired backe againe. Now when David arrived at Siceleg, and found it wholly ruined and spoiled, and seeing likewise that his two wiues, and the wiues of his companions were prisoners together with their children: he presently rent his rayment, and began to weep and lament with his companions; yea so much was he afflicted, that he had scarce any teares left him to bemoane himselfe: beside this, his companions amazed with the captiuitie of their wiues and children, were ready to ston him to death; accusing him that hee was the cause of all that which had hapned. But when as his griefe was after a manner asslaked, and hee somewhat returned to himselfe, he lifted vp his heart vnto God, and commaunded the high Priest Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and aske counsaile of God; and that done to declare vnto him whether by his assistance he might ouertake the Amalechites, if so be he should pursue them; and whether he should recouer his wiues and children that they had led away, and reuenge him of his enemies. As soone as the High Priest had certified him that he might pursue them, hee sallied out with sixe hundred souldiers, and pursued the enemy: & drawing neere vnto the riuier, he found a certaine straggler an Egyptian by nation, wholly discomfited and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was pressed, hauing for three daies space wandered in the desert without any sustenance; whom after he had refreshed with meate and drinke, and recomfited, hee asked him to whom hee belonged, and what he was.
The Egyptian told him his nation; and how he had bene left in that place by his master, because that thorow his weakness it was impossible for him to follow them. He confessed likewise, that his master was one of the number of those that had burned and sacked, not onely other quarters of Iudaea, but Siceleg also. David taking this man for his guide ouertooke them, finding some of them lying on the earth; others banquetting and following drunkenness, and almost senselesse by ouerdrinking: so recouering both his bootie and pillage, and sodainly setting vpon them, he made a great slaughter. For they being naked, and suspecting no such inconuenient, and wholly addicted to frolicke drinking and feasting, were all of them easily defeated: diuers likewise amongst them were slaine as they sat at their meat; others likewise were slaughtered whilest they carrouled the one vnto the other; and some of them perished being loaden with sleepe, and gorged with wine.
- D They likewise that were completely armed, intending to make resistance, were as easilie slaine, as they that lay naked vpon the earth: Thus Dauids men abode with him from the first hower of the morning till the euening, doing nought else but kill & murder, so that only four-hundred of the Amalechites escaped, who likewise fled being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recouered he all that which the enemy had ranfack, and amongst other things he released both his own wiues & those of his companions. Vherupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundred, which might not follow the, because they were appointed, to guard the baggage: To these, the abovesaid four hundred would not grant a part of the booty and profit, because they had not (as they said) followed the enemy with them, but shewed them themselves slacke in the pursuit; alledging that they ought to content themselves with the recovery of their wiues. But David said, that the sentence which was pronounced by them, was both euill and vniust: for since God had granted them the grace to defeat their enemies, all of them merited to haue part in the profit, which ought equally to be diuided amongst them, both amongst those that had fought, and amongst those likewise that staid behind to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath bene held firmly amongst them, that they that keep the baggage, should haue equall part and portion of the prey with those that should goe out to the battell. But when David was returned to Siceleg, hee sent vnto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Juda, a severall part of the spoile: In this manner was Siceleg sacked and burned, and thus were the Amalechites discomfited. But the Philistines assailed, and fought a bloudie battell with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philistines had the vpper hand, and slew a great number of their enemies. Saul king of Israel with his sonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with stout hearts, seeing that all their honour consisted in that onely point to die nobly, and to hazard themselves against all camifadoes of their enemies. For since the Philistines bent all their forces against them, they law no means of recouerie, so that encompassed by them they died in the middest of them, and yet before their death slew a great number of the Philistines. There were there present Sauls three sonnes, Jonathan, Amnon, and Melchior: who being defeated, all the Hebrew armie turned their backs: so that being instantly pursued by the enemy, there fell a great disorder, confusion and slaughter amongst them. Saul fled also, although hee had about him a strong squadron of men. And although the Philistines marshalled forth against him a multitude of archers, that shot many darts and arrowes at him; yet were they all but a verie few repulsed: and although hee had fought verie brauely, hauing receiued on him diuers wounds, yet being vnable to support the paine and griefe of his wounds, and trauailed with shortnesse of breath, hee commanded his esquier to draw his sword, and to thrust it thorow his body before he should be surprisid aliue by his enemies: which his esquire refused to doe, nor daring to lay hands vpon his master. For which cause Saul drew his owne sword, and setled the point to his brest and cast himselfe thereon: but vnable to force it home enough, nor make it by goring himselfe theron to pearce quite thorow him, he looked back and perceiued a young man hard beside him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, he requested him, that since himselfe was vnable to pearce himselfe with his owne handes, that he would leane vpon him, and make the sword passe thorow him, & bring him to that death which he so earnestly desired: which he did, and hauing taken from him the gold which hee had about his armes, and the royall crowne likewise, he fled away. The Elquirc seeing Saul dead, so daingly slew himselfe: Nor one of all the kings guard escaped, but all of them were slaine neere vnto the mountaine Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other side of Iordan and in the Plaine, had intelligence that Saul and his sonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their nation was slaine, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defended. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whilest the Philistines spoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul & his sons, which they spoiled and beheaded; sending their heads round about the country, to make it knowne that their enemies were defeated. They offered vp their armes also in the temple of Astaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the wals of the Citie of Bethsan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Iabes a Citie of Galaad vnderstood how the Philistines had thus cut off the heads of Saul and his sonnes, they were fore moued, and thought it became them not to bee so carelesse of them, but that they should be rescued. For which cause the most valiant and hardie amongst them (for that Citie bringeth vp men both valiant in heart and strong in body) departed and marched all night long, so as they attained Bethsan, and approaching neere the wals tooke downe the body of Saul and his sonnes, and carried them vnto Iabes, without any resistance of the enemye, in that they durst not attempt the rescue. These Iabesians lamented ouer their dead bodies and made publike lamentations, and buried them in the fairest place of their country, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this manner weeping, both men, and women & children, and beating their breasts, and lamenting the king and his sonnes, and tasting neither meat nor drinke. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because hee had disobeyed God in his warre against the Amalechites, and for that he had slaine the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himselfe also, and destroyed the Citie of the Priests. He reigned during the life of Samuel for the space of eighteene yeares, and twenty two yeares after his death. Thus finished Saul his life.

- His battell was fought on the same day that Dauid returned conquerour to Sicleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three daies after his returne; he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battell, hauing his garment rent and ashes cast vpon his head, came and cast himselfe prostrate before Dauid: and being demaunded from whence he came, he answered, from the battell of the Israelites; and certified Dauid of the unhappy issue thereof: telling him how diuers thousands of the Hebrewes were slaine, and how Saul himselfe and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. Hee likewise gaue him to vnderstand, how he himselfe retired amongst the Hebrewes; and was present at the flight of the king: confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, vnder purpose to redeeme him from the hands of his enemies: For (said hee) Saul hauing cast himselfe vpon the point of his sword, was so weake, by reason of the agonie of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himselfe. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death; the gold about his armes, and the royall crowne which hee tooke and brought from him being dead. Dauid perceiuing no cause whereby he should suspect his death, whereof hee had most euident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions. And the more was he ouerpressed with sorrow by reason of the losse of his most deere friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and preseruer of his life: And so vertuous and affectionate shewed hee himselfe towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to haue been slaine by him, yet was he fore aggrieved at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himselfe had accused himselfe for slaying the king, declaring thereby that he was the sonne of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should bee put to death. He composed likewise lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Jonathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I liue. After that he had thus honoured the king, and performed his lamentation and obsequies, he asked counsaile of God by the meanes of the Prophet, what Citie of the tribe of Iuda hee would giue him to inhabit in: who answered him

The years of the world 2891. before Christ 225. David by Gods commandment cometh and dwelleth at Hebron, and is declared king of the tribe of Iuda. David praise the labours for burying Saul and his sonnes.

that hee would giue him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſooke Siceleg, and came and dwelt in G Hebron, and brought thither his wife and ſouldiers. All the people of the aforeſaid tribe reſorted thither vnto him, and proclaimed him king: where vnderſtanding how the Iabſſins had buried Saul and his ſonnes, he ſent embaffadours vnto them, both to praiſe and approue their actions, promiſing them that both he allowed their act, and would remunerate their deuoir which they had extended toward the dead: giuing the likewiſe to vnderſtand, that the tribe of Iuda had choſen him for their king. But Abner the ſon of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble diſpoſition, vnderſtanding that Saul and Ionathan and his two other brothers were dead, came into the campe, and bringing with him the onely ſonne of Saul that was left, whoſe name was Iſboſeth, he paſſed on the other ſide of Iordan, and proclaimed him king of all the people except the tribe of Iuda. He appointed likewiſe for his royall ſeate and place of reſidence, a certaine countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the campe. From thence went he with an elected band of ſouldiers, with a reſolution to fight againſt thoſe of the tribe of Iuda, in that he was diſpleaſed with them, becauſe they had made choiſe of David for their king. Againſt him marched out Toab the ſonne of Suriaid of Suria Davids ſiſter, General of his army, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abiſai and Azael, and al Davids ſouldiers: and arriuing nere a certaine fountaine of Gabaa, hee arranged his armie in that place to enter battell. And when as Abner ſaid vnto him, that hee deſired to make triall whether part had the better ſouldiers, it was accorded betweene them, that twelue for either ſide ſhould be choſen out to determine the challenge: who marching out into a certaine place betwixt both the hoſts, and hauing darted their Iauclins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to the ſword; where mutually aſſailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, ſides and bowels, they all of them at laſt fell downe dead, as if the plot had bin determined between them. Which done, the two armies ioyned in like ſort, and after a cruel battell Abner with his followers were diſcomfited: who ſpeedily flying were inceſſantly purſued by Toab, who in his owne perſon inſiſted and exhorted his other ſouldiers to purſue them haſtily, without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Toabs brothers were hot vpon the chaſe, and the youngeſt of them called Azael gaue eſpeciall teſtimonie of his forwardnes, thorow that ſwiftheſſe in running wherewith he was endowd; for he ranne not onely more ſwift then other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whileſt thus he purſued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong courſe, without turning either on the one ſide or on the other, Abner turned backe vpon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces, he firſt couenanted with him for one ſouldiers armour, and another time ſeeing that hee could not be perſwaded to ſtay, he prayed him to arreſt himſelfe and purſue him no further, for feare leaſt being inforced to kill him, he ſhould be deſtroyed of the courage to behold his brother Toab. But perceiuing that hee made no account of his words, in that Azael inſtantly inſiſted to purſue him, Abner flying and turning himſelfe backe, ſtrooke him with a Iauclin which he had in his hand, in ſuch ſort as he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewiſe arriuing in the place where Azaels body vnaduentuſouſly fell dead, ſtaied round about him, and ſurceaſed to purſue the enemy any further. But Toab and his brother Abiſai outſtripping the body with ſwift running, and conceiuing a more mortall hatred againſt Abner, for that he had in this ſort ſlaine their brother; they purſued him vntill ſunſet, with admirable ſwiftheſſe, and incredible alacritie vnto a place called Dumaton: There mounting vpon a hilllocke, hee ſaw Abner with the tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who beganne to cry out vnto him and ſay, that men of the ſame tribe ſhould not bee ſo whetted and incenſed the one againſt the other: That their brother Azael was in the fault, becauſe that although hee had exhorted him to ceaſe from running after him, yet could hee not perſwade him, and that for the ſame cauſe he had both ſtrooken and ſlaine him. Toab wiſely digeſting theſe his ſayings, and accepting of them as of holeſome and friendly aduertisements and counſailes, he commanded the trumpet to ſound retreat, and ſurceaſed to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and hauing paſt over Iordan, returned to his campe to Iſboſeth Sauls ſonne. The next day Toab ſuruaied the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide were about three hundred and ſixtie men; and on Davids ſide nineteene, ouer and beſides Azael, whoſe body Toab and Abiſai tooke with them, and carried it vnto Bethleem, and after they had interred it in the tomb of their aunceaſtors, they repaired to Hebron vnto David. From that time forward there aroſe a ciuill warre amongst the Hebrewes, that endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwaies the vpper hand, and neuer aduentured the hazard of the field without returning with ſome aduantage,

A aduantage; whereas the ſonne of Saul and his partakers had almoſt euerie day the worſe. David at that time had ſixe ſonnes by ſo many wiues, the eldeſt of them was called Ammon the ſonne of Achimaas, the ſecond was Daniel the ſonne of Abigal, the third was called Abſolon the ſonne of Machama the daughter of Proiomey king of Geſſur; the fourth was Adonias the ſonne of his wife called Aggite: the fifth and the ſixt were called Gertheſſa and Gala. But after this ciuill warre was begunne, & that the kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountred and fought together, Abner General of the armie for king Sauls ſonne, a prudent man, & one that was beloved by the people, endeouored all that in him lay, that the whole country might be commanded by Iſboſeth, & in effect they all ſubmitted vnto him for a certaine time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accuſed to haue kept company with Riſpa Sauls concubine, the daughter of Sibath, and that Iſboſeth likewiſe had reſproued him for the ſame cauſe, he conceiued a great griefe and deſpite, ſuppoſing that hee had great iniurie done vnto him, conſidering how careful he had bene, and was, of the kings eſtate: for which cauſe hee threatened him to eſtabliſh the kingdom to David, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him ſoueraigne ouer the tribes on that ſide Iordan, but that his faith and warlike conſtancy was the cauſe thereof. For which cauſe he ſent vnto Hebron to David, requiring him by an oth to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſwade the people to forſake Sauls ſonne, and to proclaime him king of the whole region: David ſware vnto him, according as he had required, & was verie glad of that embaffage that Abner had ſent vnto him, & the rather for that vnder affirmed teſtimony of their accords, he had preſerued Michol Davids wife (whom he had purchaſed with the price of diuers great daungers, and with ſixe hundred heads of the Philiftines preſented to his father Saul, to the end he might enioy her) which Michol Abner had ſent him backe; hauing taken her from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſboſeth alſo was aſſiſtant, to whom David had written that it was reaſon that hee ſhould recouer his wife. Abner therefore aſſembled all the elders & gouernours of the people, and told them that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelues to David, he had diſſuaded them from that intent; but at this preſent if they had the will, he would condeſcend vnto them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen David (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to be king ouer all the Hebrewes; and had foretold that hee ſhould puniſh the Philiftines, and ſhould ouercome them, and bring them vnder his ſubiection. Which when the elders and gouernours vnderſtood, and were aſſured likewiſe that Abner would ſubſcribe to their reſolution as touching the eſtate, they all of them determined to ſubmit themſelues to David. Abner ſeeing the elders captiues perſwaded by Abner follow David. The Beniamites accord with Abner, he reſorteth to David and certiſieth him thereof. The year of the world, 2899. before Christ's Nativity, 1065.Men inclined to ambition and avarice dare all things.David with the whole people bewail: Abner and honour his funerals.David salueth his honour, and auoideth the suspicion
death.

When Abner had heard the words of these messengers (who ouertooke him in a place called G Betsa, some twentie furlongs off of Hebron) he strooke out of the way without suspicion of his future disaster; & Isab going before him, embraced him with great loue, and like an affectionate friend (for such as enterprise any wicked action, do often and subtilly dissemble & make shew of honestie, to the end to expell out of the innocents mind all ieaiousie or euill suspicion) where singling him from his other company, and making shew to informe him of certaine secrets, and hauing drawne him into a by-way besides the wall, accompanied only with his brother Abisai, he drew his rapier and thrust it into his short ribbes: Of which wound Abner died, surprised by the treason of Isab; who pretended and coloured that act of his, with the reuenge and death of his brother Azael, whom Abner had slaine vpon the chace in the first warre at Hebron; but in truth it was but the suspicion of his greatness and honour, fearing least hee should be deprived, H and Abner insatiated by obtaining the next degree of honour vnto David. Hereby may a man conceiue how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition sake, and to the end they may not be inferiour vnto any others in those matters. For when as they desire to attain riches and honours, they achieve it by ten thousand mischiefs; and at such time as they feare to be dispossessed, they strue to continue their estates by meanes more pernicious, because they thinke it to be the lesse sinne, and that the calamitie is lesse actiue, rather not to haue obtained to any greatnesse and power, then after the possession thereof, to fall into disgrace. Thence it commeth, that all of them intend and practise many hazards and difficult encounters, thorow the feare they haue to lose their degree. But it sufficeth to haue briefly touchen this point. David hauing notice of the murder of Abner, conceiued a great griefe in his heart, and called all his assistants to witness, lifting vp his hands vnto God, and protesting that he was no partaker of the murder, and that Abner had bene slaine without his commaundement or will. He likewise vttered most grievous curses against the murderer, his house and accomplices, by which hee wished them to be subiect to the fatal penalty of murder: for he greatly suspected least he should be held in suspicion to be a party in that which had happed vnto Abner, contrarie to his faith, oath and promise, which he had past vnto him. Moreover, hee commanded that all the people should weepe & lament for him, and that the funerals of his body should be honored according to the accustomed fashion, in renting of garments and putting on sackcloth: and that the same should be done the coffin being carried before, which both hee and the chiefeft gouernours of the Israelites followed, beating on their breasts, and shedding teares, and testifying the loue which they bare vnto him during his life, and their displeasure to see him dead, who had bin murdered contrary to their wil and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs composed in his praise by David himselfe, who setting himselfe on the tombe first of all lamented, and gaue others cause of lamentation. And so much was hee confused at the death of this Abner, that he swore to forbear all kind of meat vntill the sunne set, notwithstanding all the instances of his friends, who vrged him to take refection: which act of his purchased him much good will and loue amongst the people. For they that loued Abner were verie glad to be witnesses of that honour which he did him in his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, euery way according to the custome, as if he had been his kinsman or friend, and not embasing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if hee had bene his enemy. And in generali, all of them were so glad of the curtesie, sweetnes and royal nature of king David, that they esteemed in the like case, that hee would haue the like estimate of them, as they saw him haue of deceased Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increased the peoples good opinion of him, escaping thereby the suspicion & conceit that he might in some sort haue bin accessarie to his death. He protested also vnto the people, that he conceiued no small griefe at the losse of so good a man, declaring thereby that it was no small stain vnto the state of the Hebrewes to be deprived of him, who had the meanes to maintaine their peace by his good aduise, and to ratifie the same by his executions and warlike valour: But God (said he) who hath care of all things shall not suffer him to die vnreuenged: And hee it is that shall beare me witness, that it lieth not in my power to punish Isab and Abisai, who haue greater credit in their armie then my selfe; yet shall they not escape Gods iustice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

CHAP. II.

Isab seth slaine thorow the treason of his friends and followers: the whole kingdome descendeth to David.

- Isab* seth, Sauls sonne, had notice of Abners death, he was sore displeased, not onely for that he perceived himselfe to be deprived of his neere kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had settled the crowne on his head. Neither did hee himselfe long time remaine aliue after him: but by the sonnes of Ieremon, Banaoth and Thannus, hee was traitorously done to death. These two being Beniamites, and of the chiefeft nobilitie amongst them, made their reckoning that they would make away Isab seth, and thereby obtaine great recompence at Dauids hands; supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefeft place and dignitie in the armie, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isab seth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleepe, and vnassisted by any of his guard, and perceiuing likewise that the Porter was fast, who thorow his trauell and other businesse (by reason of the extreame heate) was laid downe to rest: they entred into his lodging whereas Isab seth was asleepe, & slew him: and hauing cut off his head, they trauelled all the night & day long, as if they fledde from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure them fro perill. And when they came to Hebron, they presented David with Isab seths head, offering themselues as his most dutifull liegemen to do him seruice, who had deliuered him of an enemy, & made away an aduersarie against his roialtie. But David allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus vnto them; O cursed men, said he (on whom I intend presently to execute iustice) haue you not heard how I punished him that murdered Saul, and brought his roiall crowne vnto me? Yea, although he slew him vpon his owne instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surpris him aliue? Were you of that opinion that I was changed, & that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to bee partaker with you in your mischiefs, or that I wil countenance them, as if these acts of yours (who are murderers of your master) were laudable in you? In you, I say, who haue slaine a good man on his bed, that iniured no man, but was your benefactor, & who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure yourselves, that you shall be punished in his behalfe, and shall yield me satisfaction by the losse of your liues, because you haue thought that Isab seths death would work my contentment: for, you could not in any sort dishonor me more, then by conceiuing such an opinion of me. Which said, he adiudged them to die by the most cruell torments that might be imagined: & with all the honour that he might, he caused Isab seths head to be interred in Abners tombe.
- These murderers beeing thus done to death, all the chiefeft of the people repaired to David vnto Hebron (both they that commanded ouer thousands, & such also as were Gouernours) & submitted themselues vnto him, reckoning vp the good affection they had borne him, both during Sauls life time, as also the honour which they had neuer discontinued to beare him, since the first time that he was Coronell ouer a thousand, especially for that hee had bene chosen by God thorow the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their king, and his children after him; declaring vnto him, that God had giuen him the cuntry of the Hebrewes, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. David accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting the to persist, assuring them that they should neuer repent themselues of their obedience: and after he had banquetted and entertained them, hee sent them to assemble all the people.
- Of the tribe of Juda, there came together about fixe thousand eight hundred men of war, bearing for their armes a buckler and a iauelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sonnes, and besides whom the tribe of Juda had assigned the kingdome to David. Of the tribe of Simeon, 7 thousand, & a hundred or somewhat more, of that of Leui 4700, whose chiefeftaine was Iedam, with who was Sadoc the high priest, accompanied with 20 & two gouernors of the same linage. Of the tribe of Beniamin 4000 men of war: for this tribe were as yet of opinion that some of the heires of Saul should raigne. Of that of Ephraim 20800, both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the halfe as many, namely 8000. Of that of Issachar 200, who were skilfull in diuination, & 20000 men of war. Of that of Zabulon 20000 chosen fighting men: for onely this intire tribe was wholly at Dauids command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the tribe of Rephaim there were 1000 chiefeftains, famous for their valour, & armed with shield & iauelin, attended by an infinite number of their tribe. Of the tribe of Dan there were 27000 chosen men. Of that of Aser 40000. Of the two tribes on the other side of Jordan, & of the half tribe of

of Manasses six score thousand armed men, with buckler, iavelin, murrion and sword: The rest of the other tribes also were souldiers. All this multitude was assembled together in Hebron before David, with great prouision of victuals and vine, sufficient to sustaine them all, who all of them with one consent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had mustred, & banquetted for three daies space in Hebron, David dislodged from thence with his whole host, and quetted for three daies space in Hebron, David dislodged from thence with his whole host, and repaired to Ierusalem. But the Iebusites, who at that time inhabited the cittie, & were of the race of the Chanaanites, shutting vp their gates against his coming, and placing on their wals as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other sort, in contempt of him, scoffingly iested & said, that these were sufficient to keep out the enemy: so much trusted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being sore displeased, began to besiege Ierusalem, and vsing all diligence and industry to surpriſe the same, he incontinently expressed how strong he was, checking thereby other mens pride, who perhaps would haue done the like vnto him, & afterwards tooke the lower Towne. And for that the higher Towne was yet vnſurprised, the King resolved to encourage his men of warre to shew themselves valiant, promising them honours & recompence; proclaiming that he would make him Generall ouer all the people, that should first of all scale, ascend, & seize the wall. Whilst thus they enforced themselves to mount without refusing any trauell (thorow the desire they had to obtaine the gouernment that was promised) Iobab, the son of Saruias, was the forwardest amongst the rest; and hauing got vpon the wall, cried vnto the king, requiring him to grant him the generall gouernment.

After therefore he had cast out the Iebusites from the higher cittie, and repaired Ierusalem, he called it the cittie of David, and remained therein all the time of his raigne: so that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, ouer the sole tribe of Iuda, was 7 yeeres and six moneths. But after he had established Ierusalem for his royall cittie, his fortunes dailie more and more increased, because God both furthered, and bettered them. Hiram also, king of Tire, sent vnto him, and made a league of amitie with him: hee presented him likewise with presents of Cedar wood, and workmen and Masons, to build him a royall house in Ierusalem. Now, when the King had seized the higher cittie, he annexed thereto therevnto, and made one body of twaine; and hauing walled it in, he gaue the gouernment thereof to Iobab. This king was the first that droue the Iebusites out of Ierusalem, and called the same by his name. For, from the time of Abraham, our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there some that infer, that Homer vnder that name intended Ierusalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyma is as much to say, as Securitie. All the time from the exploit of warre made by Iosuah against the Chanaanites, and since the diuision of the Country (during all which time the Israelites could not driue the Chanaanites out of Ierusalem) vntill such time as David tooke the same by force, were five hundred and fiftene yeeres. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongst the Iebusites; who, for that he was well affected towards the Hebrewes, was not put to death in the surprisall which David made of Ierusalem: but (as I wil shortly hereafter declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the king. David espoused other wiues besides those which he had; besides many other concubines: by them he had cleuen sonnes, whose names are these which follow, Amnas, Emma, Ebamatha, Salomon, Iebar, Eliel, Phalma, Ennapha, Ienaah, Eliphail: besides these, he had a daughter called Thamar. Nine of these were begotten on noble mothers, but the two last (which were named by vs) were the sonnes of concubines. But Thamar was Abisai's sister by the same father and mother.

Now, when the Paleſtines knew that the Hebrewes had created David king, they led forth their army against him towards Ierusalem, where encamping themselves in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not farre off from the Cittie) they in that place expected the encounter. But the king of the Hebrewes, who was vnto doe nothing inconsiderately, with-

Dauids command as touching the transportation of the Arke.

David placeth the Arke in Obed Edomes house, who prospereth there-through in all felicitie. The Arke transported in to Dauids house, and placed in a tabernacle. David is mocked by his wife Michol.

Our Gods aduise, commanded the high priest to prophesie and foretell, what successe and event the warre should haue; who after he had informed him that God smileth on, & fauoureth their attempts, he presently drew out his armie against the enemy: and striking the battell, he sodainlie assailed the enemies on their backs, and partly slew them, and partly put them to flight. But yet no man suspect, that the army of the Paleſtines was either small in number, or weak in courage, which at that time assailed the Hebrewes, in that hee coniectureth in his mind, that they were easily overcome; without either attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to knowe that all Syria, Phenicia (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare armes with them, and were confederates in this war: which was the onely cause, that notwithstanding they were so many times overcome, and had lost diuers thousands of men, that they desisted not to assaile the Hebrewes with more great force: and that which is more, hauing beene defeated in the battels before recited, yet forbore they not to assaile David anew with thrice as much power as before, & to incampe in the same place. For which cause, David tooke counsell of God once more, what the issue of this battell should bee: and the high Priest told him, that hee should encampe in the forrest called Teares, because it was not far off from the enemies campe, and that he should not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battell, before the trees did shake without any agitation or breath of wind. Whereupon, as soone as the trees shooke, & the time which God had appointed was come, without any delay, he issued out, to enioy a prepared and manifest victorie. For the squadrons of the enemy were disarranged, and incontinently betooke them to flight, and were swiftly followed and slaughtered, vntill the Cittie of Gerar (which is a frontire towne of their country) and their campe was thorowly ranſacked, wherein there were found great riches; and amongst all other things, their Gods were beaten to peeces.

The battell being brought to this end, it seemed good vnto David (by the counsell of the Elders and Coronels ouer thousands) that all the flower of their youth, should bee assembled from all the parts of the country, euery one according to his tribe. Secondly, that the Priests & Leuites should repaire to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Arke of God, and conuay it to Ierusalem; to the end that when it should be there, the seruice of God might thereafter be celebrated in that place, and other sacrifices and honours, agreeable to the diuine Maieſtie, might be performed. And had the same beene done during the life of Saul, no inconuenience had fallen vpon the. VVhen as all the people were assembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transſerre the Arke; vvhich the Priests carying out of Aminadabs house, they laid it vpon a new Waine, vvhich (together with oxen) their brothers and children drew.

The King marched foremost, and after him all the people, praising God, and tuning all sorts of melodie then vsuall in that country, with diuersity of sounds of instruments, of Dances, & Shalms, Trumpets & Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Arke into Ierusalem. But whē they were come to the threshing floore of Chidon (which is a certaine place to called) Oza, died, throwing the wrath of God: for the Oxen stumbling that drew the chariot, and the Arke some-what shaken, he stretched out his hand with intent to sustaine the same; and because he was no Priest, God strooke him till he died. The King and the people were sore aggrieved at the death of Oza, and the place where he died, is called to this day Ozas Striking. David, fearing least if he should retire the Arke with him into the Cittie, the like happe should attend him that had befallen Oza (who was in that sort done to death, for that he had onely thus stretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his owne house within the Cittie, but commaunded that it should bee left in the possession of one called Obed, by descent a Leuite, and in behauiour a man good and vertuous: vvhich it remained for three months space, during which time, his house was blessed with all worldly goods and goodnes. The king being ascertained what advantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore and needie man, was suddenly become very rich, so that all men had their eyes fixed on him, & they that heard speake of his house enuied him) hee assured himselfe that no inconuenience would befall him: for which cause hee retired the Arke into his owne house, which was caryed by the Priests, and seuen quires of singing men disposed by the king went before the same. The king himselfe likewise touched, and played vpon the Harp, so that Michol, Dauids wife and Sauls daughter, seeing him entertaining himselfe after that maner, mocked at him. The Arke then being thus caryed, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dressed by David, who offered most magnificent sacrifices of all sorts, and forgo: not the sacrifices for prosperities: hee feasted all the people likewise, both men, women and children, distributing vnto euery one a cake, a morsell of roasted meat, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the sacrifice: and after hee had thus feasted the people, he dismissed them, and retreated himselfe into his owne house. But Michol

his wife (and daughter to king Saul) drawing neere vnto him vpon his returne, besought God for him; that it might please him in all other things she might expresse vnto her husband all that, which became her intire and vnequall loue towards him: but in this she blamed him, because that being so great and mightie a king as he was, hee had dishonoured himselfe in dauncing; despoiling himselfe, and discouering partly that which became him not, doing all this in companie of his seruants and handmaidens. To whom Dauid answered, that he was not ashamed in performing a thing so acceptable vnto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him about all others, assuring her that he would play and dance oftentimes after that sort, without care whether his demeanour pleased either her or her chambermaids. The king perceiuing how by Gods assistance his affaires prospered daily more & more, thought that it should be a hainous offence in him, if he should dwell in houses made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Arke suffer it to remaine vnder a pavilion: for which cause he conceived a desire to build a Temple vnto God, according as Moses had foretold: and to this intent consulted he with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to performe all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be each way assistant vnto him: for which cause he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple. But the same night God appeared vnto Nathan, commanding him to certifie Dauid, that hee accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable vnto him (considering in especiall that no one before him had a thought to performe the like: yet notwithstanding (although his deliberation were such) hee permitted him not to finish the same, by reason he had followed many wars, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his decease (which shall happen after he hath liued along and prosperous life) his sonne called Salomon (to whom hee shall leaue the kingdome after his death) shall cause a Temple to be built vnto him, promising him to assise and fauour the sayd Salomon (euen as the father doth his sonne) and that he would continue the royalty in his heires and their successors: And that if they shall happen to offend him, hee will onely punish them with sicknesse and sterilitie. Dauid vnderstanding these words which were deliuered him by the Prophet, was very ioyfull, by reason that the royaltie was firmly assured to his heires, and for that his house should be famous and renowned; and presenting himselfe before the Arke, he prostrated himselfe and adored, and gaue God thanks for all the benefites he had bestowed on him; for that from a poore and humble shepherd, he had raised him to so great a height of maiestie and glorie, and for that he had promised to haue care of his posteritie as erst he had had of the Hebrewes and their libertie. This sayd, after he had sung hymnes vnto God, he departed.

He therefore assembled his army anew, commanding them to be in a readinesse to march forward to the war: whenas therefore he supposed that the army was dressed, he departed out of Ierusalem, and made a road vpon the Philistines, whom he ouercame in battell, & took a great part of the country from them, by means whereof he enlarged the frontiers of the Hebrewes, and translated the war, and led forth his forces against the Moabites: whose army being diuided into two parts, was by him defeated and ouerthrown, and the rest were taken prisoners, and tributes were imposed on them, which they were bound to satisfie every yeare. Afterwardes hee led out his host against Adarezer sonne of Ara, King of Sophonia: and waging battell with him neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, he slewe about twenty thousand of his footmen, and some five thousand of his horse: hee tooke also almost a thousand of his chariots, the greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them onely referred to his owne vse.

CHAP. VI.

They of Damasco are overcome by DAVID.

Adad King of Damasco and of Syria, vnderstanding that Dauid had made warre on Adarezer (who was both his friend and confederate) issued forth with great forces to be assistant vnto him, and to deliuer him from his enemies according as he expected. But entering fielde, and waging battell with Dauid neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, hee was overcome and lost a great number of his souldiers: for in that battell there were slaine on his side by the Hebrew enemy, to the number of twenty thousand, and the rest fled. Of this king, Nicholas the Historiographer maketh mention in the fourth book of his histories, in these words. Since that and long time after; a certaine man of that country called Adad gouerned in Damasco, and ouer the rest of Syria (except Phoenicia) who making warre against Dauid King of Iudaea; and having oftentimes fought with him, in his last encounter (wherein hee was overcome neere vnto the flood Euphrates) hee shewed himselfe more resolute then all other kings in force and valour. Moreouer he speaketh of his heires, how after his death, they succeeded him both in royalty and name, the one after the other, and saith thus. Hee being deceased, his sonnes reigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiuing from their father, the same name and the same kingdome, after the manner of the Ptolomyes of Aegypt. The third of these being more mighty then the rest, and desirous to reuenge himselfe in warre of these iniuries, which were offered vnto his grandfather, led forth his army against the Iewes, and destroyed the country called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any waies from the truth: for he of whom he speaketh, is that Adad, that made warre in Samaria, during the reign of Ahab King of Israel, of whom we will speake hereafter in his place. But when Dauid had led forth his campe against Damasco, and against the rest of the country of Syria, he reduced them all vnder his obedience, placing garrisons amidst their country, and imposing tribute vpon them, which they should pay vnto him. He dedicated also to God in the City of Ierusalem, the golden quivers and armors which Adads guard were wont to wear; which afterward Syssac king of Aegypt took at such time as hee warred against Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the temple of Ierusalem, as it shall be declared hereafter, when as wee shall come to intreat of that Egypt matter. This king of the Hebrews being inspired by God (who made him prosperous in all his wars) encamped before the goodliest Cities Adarezer had, that is to say, Berthea and Mackon; which he besieged, tooke, and spoyled: where there was found great store of golde and siluer and of brasse, which was of more estimation then gold, whereof Salomon made that great vessel called the Sea, and other faire lauers; at such time as he adorned and furnished the temple of God. When the King of Amath vnderstood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were destroyed, he grew affraid of his owne estate, and resolved with himselfe to make a league & confederacy with Dauid, before he might come out against him: and to that intent he sent his sonne Adoram vnto him, to testifie and expresse that contentment hee had receiued, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemy, and to contract with him amitie and confederation. He sent him presents also, namely, vessels of antique work of gold, of siluer, and of brasse: whereupon Dauid made a league with Thani (for so was the king of Amath called) and receiued the presents that were sent vnto him; and afterwards dismissed his sonne with conuenient honor, both for the one and the other: and consecrated that to God which hee had sent him (together with the gold and siluer, which he had taken from other Cities and nations that were subiect vnto him.) For God did not only so farre fauour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own wars; but hauing also sent Abisai Ioabs brother the Lieutenant of his army against the Idumzeans, he likewise granted him victorie: for Abisai slew in the battell about eightene thousand of them, and filled all Idumaea with garrisons, challenging a tribute throughout the country by the pole. This king loued iustice of his own nature, and exercised iudgement according to veritie. He had for his lieutenant generall in all his armies Ioab, and appointed Iosaphat the son of Achilles chiefe ouer the Registers. After Abiathar, he established Sadoc of the house of Phinees for high Priest, who was his friend. Sisa was his Secretarie: Banaia the sonne of Ioia was capitaine ouer his guard, and all the elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. Hee remembring himselfe also of the conuenions and oathes that were past twixt him & Jonathan the sonne of Saul, and of the amitie and affection that had been between them (for besides all other graces which he had, he most freshly retained them in memorie, from vvhom in times past hee

Mephibosheth his fathers house and all *Saul*s purchases, commaunding him to manure and husband his possessions, and to haue care of all things, and to returne the reuenue to Ierusalem, for that Mephibosheth was every day to take his refection at his table, charging both him & his 15. sons, I and 20. seruants, to doe him seruice. After the king had thus disposed of him, Siba did him reue-rence, and after he had protested to performe whatsoeuer he had giuen him in charge, he departed, and *Jonathan*s sonne remained in Ierusalem, where he liued at the kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had bene his owne sonne: he had a sonne also called Micha.
These were the honors that those children which suruiued after Jonathan and *Saul*s death, receiued at Dauids hands. About the same time died Naas king of the Ammonites, who during his life time was Dauids friend, and his sonne succeeded him in his kingdom, to whom David sent embassadors to comfort him, exhorting him to digest his fathers death with patience, assuring him that he would expresse no lesse loue towards him, then he did vnto his father. But the gouer-nours of the Ammonites entertained this embassage very contumeliously, and not according K as David had kindly intended it, and murmured against their king, telling him that they were but spies sent by David to seeke into his forces, and discouer the strength of his countrey, vnder a pretext of humanitie, counselling him to stand vpon his garde, and not to giue eare to his pro-testation, least being deceived, he should fall into some remedielesse inconuenient.
Naas king of the Ammonites, supposing that his gouernors spake nothing but truth, outraged the embassadors that were sent vnto him with great iniuries: for causing the half of their beards to be shauen close by the chin, and cutting away the half of their vestments, he sent them backe again, returning their answers not in words, but in deeds. Which when David saw, he was grieuously displeased, and made it known that he would not suffer that mockerie and iniurie so easily to be digested, but that he would make war on the Ammonites, and reuenge those indignities L that were offered to his embassadors. The friends and gouernours of Naas considering how they had violated & broken the peace, and how for that occasion they deserued to be punished, prepared for the war, & sent 1000 talents to Syrus king of Mesopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that warre, and receiue their pay: they requested the like of Saba: these kings had 20000. footmen in camp. They hired also with their mony the king of the country called Michas, and the fourth called Istob, which two had with them 12000. thousand souldiers.

CHAP. VII.

How DAVID overcame the Mesopotamians.

BUT David was nothing amated, neither with the confederacy, nor force of the Ammo-nites, but trusting in God, resolved that the cause of his warre was iust: for which cause hee continued in reuenge of those outrages which hee had receiued by them. Having therefore mustered vnder Iobab the flower of his whole army, he commanded him to depart and make warre vpon them: who came and incamped himselfe before their chiefeest Citie called Ara- math; which when the enemies perceiued, they issued forth and arranged themselves in battell (not

A not altogether, but in two seuerall parts.) For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plaine, and the Ammonites stood in battell array neere vnto their Citie gate, to make head against the Hebrewes. Iobab perceiuing this, vsed this stratageme to counteruaile their complot: for he chole out the ablest and stoutest of his men to serue vnder him against Syrus, and the other kings confederates with him, and gaue the rest to his brother Abisai, commanding him to oppose himselfe against the Ammonites whilest he charged the rest: willing him, that if hee perceiued that the Syrians were stronger then he was, and did put him to the worst, to displace his squadron, and to succour him; promising to doe the like, if he perceiued him to be ouerpressed by the Ammonites: When as therefore he had exhorted his brother to behaue himselfe valiantly and vertuously, and to take heed least he should light on some dishonour, hee sent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other side assailed the Syrians, who valiantly resisted him for a little space: yet notwithstanding Iobab slew many of them, and finally constrained them to turne their backs. Vvhich when the Ammonites perceiued (who were afraid of Abisai and his people) they retreated likewise, and (conforming themselves according to the example of their allies) they tooke their flight into the Citie. By which meane Iobab hauing obtained the vpper hand ouer his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victorie vnto the king to Ie-rusalem.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this losse: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certaine knowledge that the Hebrewes were stronger then themselves, yet would they by no means listen after peace. They therefore sent vnto Chalams king of the Syrians on the other side of Euphrates, whose confederacy they attained by bribes and huge sums of money. This king had one, who was called Sabeus, for his lieutenant generall, and vnder him four score thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen: David vnderstanding that the Am-monites drew to head, and intended anew to beare armes against him, hee surgealed to prosecute the war against the by his lieutenants, & himselfe in person with all his forces passed ouer the riu-er of Iordan, and went out against them; and at last meeting and fighting with them, ouercame them, killing welne fortie thousand of their footmen, and seuen thousand of their horsemen: he hurt Sabeus also, Chalams Lieutenant, who likewise died of that wound. The issue of this combate being thus, the Mesopotamians yielded themselves vnto David, & gaue him many great and magnificent presents. Hee therefore, by reason of the winter retired himselfe for that time to

D Ierusalem, but incontinently vpon the spring time hee sent out his Lieutenant Iobab once more to make warre vpon the Ammonites: who ouerrunning their countrey, vtterly spoyled it, and shut them vp in Aramath their principal city, which he ouercame & entred. About this time it so fell out, that David (notwithstanding hee was a iust man, & one that feared God, & an exact obseruer of all the lawes and ordinances of his forefathers) fell, and offended God most grieuously. For as hee walked on the top of his royall palace; from the time of mid-day vntill the euening (for betwixt these times hee vsed accustomedly to walke) he perceiued a woman of incomparable beau-tie, and surpassing perfection, whose name was Bethsabe, who in her house bathed her selfe in a cleere and pleasant fountaine: and beeing deuoured and rauished with her beauty, hee could not refraine his concupiscence, but sending for her, tooke the spoile of her beauty and chastitie: and by that meanes got her with child. Vvhich when she perceiued, shee sent vnto the king, beseech-ing him to be thinke himselfe of some meanes whereby her shame might bee concealed, and her life (which was in hazard by the law for her adultery) might bee preferred. Vvhich thereupon sent for Vrias (*Bethsabe*s husband and one of *Iobab*s soldiers, who at that time was at the siege of A- ramath) and questioned with him vpon his arriual, as touching the estate of the siege & of the armie: who answering him that all things were fallen out according as he could wish; David tooke a portion of his owne supper and gaue it him, willing him to repaire vnto his owne house, and repose him selfe with his wife. But Vrias did nothing lesse, but slept among his fellow souldiers neere vnto the person of the king. Which when David vnderstood, he asked him wherfore he repaired not to his owne house, according to the custome of husbands that had bene long time absent

E vpon a long voiage, and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had bene sequestred so many daies? Vrias replied, that it became him not either to repose or take pleasure with his wife, whilest his companions and generall lay vpon the bare ground in the enemies countrey. Which said, David commanded him to sojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might send him backe againe to Iobab. That night the king inuited him to supper, and although he were made drunke thorow the abundance of wine hee receiued (which the king had purposely caused to be giuen him) yet notwithstanding he slept at the kings gate without any desire to reparaire home vnto his wife. Herewith the king was much despised, so that he wrote G vnto Iobab, commanding him to punish Vrias, because hee had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his should not be discouered, hee suggested him both in the meanes and manner of the prosecution of his death, enioyning him to place him in the ranke of greatest danger, and in the face of the enemy, to the intent that in the fight his person might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whilst they that fought next vnto him retyred when they saw him charged. When as he had thus written and sealed vp the letter with his owne seale, he deliuered it to Vrias to beare vnto Iobab: who receiuing the same, and conceiuing the kings pleasure, placed Vrias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight most desperately, appointing him out certaine of his best soldiers to second him, with purpose, that he would come & succour them with all his power, to the end hee might breake thorow the wall and enter the Citie.

Vrias (who was a noble souldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the king, and reputation amongst all those of his tribe, and tooke delight to bee employed in hazardous attempts, and refused no daunger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Iobab gaue priuate intelligence to those that were ranked next vnto him, that when they should see the enemy fall out with greatest furie, they should abandon Vrias. When as therefore the Hebrews drew neere vnto the Citie, the Ammonites feared lest the enemy should speedily scale and enter the Citie on that side where Vrias was ranked: for which cause they picked out a squadron of the most resolute men amongst them, and setting open their gates, sodainly with swift course, force & violence, they cast themselves vpon their enemies. They that were neere Vrias seeing them draw neere, retyred backe againe, according as Iobab had before hand commanded them: but Vrias being ashamed to flie, or forsake his ranke, expected the enemy, and valiantly encountering him, he slue diuers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the midst of them, hee was slaine, and with him some other of his companions perished in the conflict. This done, Iobab sent messengers vnto the king to certifie him, that not enduring the delay of the siege, and assailing and scaling the walles, hee was compelled to returne backe into his campe, with losse of some men, and repulse from the Citie; yet had hee commanded the messengers, that if they perceiued the King to bee displeased with the newes, they should giue him to vnderstand that Vrias was dead.

The King hearing this discourse (according as Iobabs messengers had deliuered it) made a shew to be displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him that he had so neerely approched the wall, alledging that he might haue done farre better, to haue taken the towne by mine or engine: vrging in way of example the act of Abimelech Gedeons sonne, who intending to surprize by force a tower that was within the Citie of Tebez, was strooken with a stone that was cast at him by an olde woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entering an action ouer rash and dangerous, shamefully died. In remembrance of whose disalter, they ought to haue bene more warie, and not to haue approched the wall of the enemy so neerely. For it is a very good point in warre, to haue in memory both fatall and fortunate successes, to the end that when a man is in the like dangers, hee may follow the one, and flie the other. Whilst thus hee rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Vrias death, which did somewhat appease him: So that he commanded them to tell Iobab, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of warre, that sometime the one side had the better, and sometime the other: to conclude, that he should prouide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receiue any further losse; counselling him by trenches and engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the towne should bee put to the sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things vnto Iobab, according to the Kings commandement. But Vrias wife, hauing notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him diuers daies: and when the dule and lamentations were finished and performed to the dead; the king espoused her incontinently, and she bare him a man child: yet God beheld not this marriage with a fauorable eie, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dreame, hee blamed the king verie fore. Now Nathan who was a wise and experienced man, knew well that when kings are displeased, they suffer themselves rather to bee overcome by passion, then by reason: for which cause he determined to concale the menaces and threatnings that God had made, for that time; and discoursed of other profitable matters with David after this manner, requiring the king that it would please him to censure and deliuer his opinion in the same. Two men (said he) dwelt in one & the same Citie: the one of them was rich, hauing many troupes of great and small cattell; the other that was poore, had but one only sheepe, which he nourished with his children, sharing him out a

Nathan prophesieth of Dauids punishment, and sharply rebuketh him: he is condemned by his own mouth, and repenteth himselfe.

David fasteth seuen daies, lamenting and mourning for his sonne.

David being certified that the child was dead, ariseth and washing taketh sustenance.

David yieldeth a reason why during the childs life he fasted, & why being dead hee took refection. Salomon was borne by Bethsabe.

Iobab by letters soliciteeth the king to come to the surprisall of Rabatha. David surpriseth Rabatha by force, giueth it for a prey to his soldiers.

A part of that whereon he fed, and louing her as tenderly as a man would doe his onely daughter. It hapned that this rich man had a stranger that repaired to his house, for whose entertainment he would not suffer any one of his own beasts to be slaine, but sent a violent messenger, who tooke away the poore mans sheepe, and caused it to be dressed to entertaine his guest. This report of Nathans displeased the king very fore, in so much as hee swore vnto him, that he that had bene so bolde to commit such an act, was a wicked man, and that reason required that he should restore him fourefold, and that after he should bee put to death. Whereunto Nathan replied, saying, that it was he that deserued this punishment, who had giuen sentence against himselfe, in that he had presumed to commit so grievous a sinne. Moreouer, hee certified him of Gods displeasure, who notwithstanding he had made him king ouer all the Hebrewes, and Lord ouer all the nations round about, which were diuers and great; and who besides these things had warranted him from the hands of Saul, and had giuen him wiues, whom he had espoused iustly and lawfully, was so despised and dishonoured by him, that he had espoused and kept by him an other mans wife, and caused her husband to be slaine, and betrayed him vnto his enemy. For which sinnes of his, he pronounced that he should be punished by God, and his wiues should bee violated by one of his owne sonnes, who should likewise lay a share for him: so that hee should suffer a manifest plague for the sinne hee had committed in secret. Moreouer (said he) the sonne which thou shalt haue by her, shall shortly die.

After the king had receiued this message, he was sore troubled; and being confused, he powred forth teares & sighed for sorrowe, confessing that he had done wickedly: for vndoubtedly before this time hee had alwaies feared God, and had neuer in his life offended him, but in that act with Vrias wife. Whereupon after his submission, God was appeased and tooke compasion of him, promising him to continue both his life and kingdome, and that he would be no more displeased with him, if so be that he repented him of the sinne he had committed. After that Nathan had declared these things vnto David, hee departed vnto his owne house. But God inflicted a grievous sicknesse on the infant that was borne by Bethsabe: for which cause the king was sore aggrieved, and for seuen daies space would take no refection; notwithstanding that he was earnestly instant thereunto by his household seruants. Hee put on likewise a mourning habit, and laide himselfe on the ground vpon a sacke; beseeching him that it would please him to grant him the childs life, towards whose mother he bare so exceeding loue and affection. But when the infant was deceased about the seuen day of his sicknesse, his seruants durst not certifie him thereof, supposing that if it should come vnto his eare, he would the more obstinately abstaine from eating, and the care of his person, and should bee in danger by reason of his disordinate griefe for his childe, to procure and hasten his own death, considering he had so vehemently bin afflicted and tormented for his onely sicknesse. But the king perceiuing by their looks that his seruants were troubled; and that they concealed some fatall harme, and gathering thereby that his sonne was dead: he called vnto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, hee arose and walked himselfe, and put on a white garment, and presented himselfe before the tabernacle of God, and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and seruants were very fore amazed, and wondered why hee hauing done none of these things during the childs sicknesse, should now after his death doe all these things at once; they besought him therefore that it might be lawfull for them to demaund the cause of these his proceedings. To whom he answered, that he would teach and discouer that vnto them, of which they were ignorant. Vnderstand you not (said hee) that while the child was aliue, and I had hope of his recouerie, I omitted no meanes whereby I might moue God vnto mercie: but now after that hee is dead, it were in vaine for mee to spend my selfe with vnecessary griefe. Which when they heard, they praised the wisdom & consideration of the king. After this he knew Bethsabe his wife, who became with childe, and was brought a-bed of a sonne, who (by Nathans direction) was called Salomon. Meane while Iobab pressed the Ammonites with a sore siege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things necessarie, so that they were welny famished for want of victuall and prouision: for they drew their water from a little spring in such sort, that they feared lest if they should vse it to their owne contentment, it would be sodainly dried. Hee therefore wrote vnto the king, and certified him of the estate of the Citie, and exhorted him to come in person, and be present at the surprisall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be famed by his name.

The king vnderstanding that which Iobab had written, allowed of his readinesse, good-will, and faith, & taking with him all the forces which he had, he came to the taking in of Rabatha, which being by him forcibly surprisid and giuen in pillage vnto his souldiers, hee retained for himselfe the crowne of the king of the Ammonites waighing a talent of gold, in the midst wherof was en-chased a Sardonyx of great valew, which Dauid wore vpon his head. He found likewise in that ci-tie diuers spoyles of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the Cities of the Ammonites which hee tooke by force. But after that the king was returned vnto Ierusalem, there fell a grievous accident in his family vpon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull, and surpased all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, borne by the same mother that Abfalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of Dauid became enamoured: and for that hee could not enjoy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginitee, and the hand that was had of her) hee grew so melancholy that his body dried vp, and his colour changed thorow the verie griefe that consumed him. A certaine cousin and friend of his called Jonathan (a man of great reach and quick vnderstanding) perceiuing this his passion, and noting every day how Ammons beautie and strength decayed and wasted, came vnto him and asked him the cause thereof, allcading that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was growne passionate thorow the loue hee bare vnto his sister by the fathers side, Jonathan suggested him both the meanes and inuention to compasse his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himselfe to bee sicke, and that if his father came to visit him, hee should desire him to send his sister to minister vnto him, by which meanes hee should easily and speedily bee deliuered of his sickness. This counsell of his was plausible in Ammons eares, who presently counterfained sicknes; and laid him downe on his bed (according as Jonathan had ad-uised him:) and when Dauid was come to visit him, hee required him to send his sister vnto him, which hee did. She being arriued, hee praied her with her owne hands that she would temper and frie some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her owne making: for which cause shee in her brothers presence tempered the flower, and made certaine cakes and fried them in the frying pan, and presented them vnto him: but he tasted them not, but commanded all his seruants to retire themselues out of his lodging, because hee intended to take his rest without noyse or trouble. As soone as this commandement of his was performed, hee prayed his sister to bring the meate into his most retired and priuie chamber: whereunto the damsell condescended: whereupon hee sodainly surprised her, & began to perfwade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said vnto him: Forbeare my brother, forbeare to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Giue ouer this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which will breed nought els but disgrace and infamy to our whole family; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, require me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from mee by force. But hee enraged with loue, neglected all these sayings, and wholly poisoned with the sting of disordinate passion, rauished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist. And as soone as he had asslaked his lustfull desire, a certaine hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many iniurious words against Thamar: so that hee comanded her to arise and depart. She answered, that this second outrage was more hainous then the former; for that hauing violated her, he would not suffer her to remaine there vntill night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, & during the light, to the end she might meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: Notwithstanding all these iust reasons of hers, hee commanded his seruant to driue her out of the doores. She strangely aggrieved at the outrage & violence that had been offered her, tore her garment (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the Citie with cries and lamentations, wherein shee expressed what wrong had beene done vnto her. With her thus distracted, her brother Abfalon met, enquiring of her what euill hap had befallen her. To whom she reported all the iniurie which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon hee exhorted her to pacifie her selfe, and to suffer moderately whatsoever had befallen her; and not to suppose her selfe to bee indignified by an act of her brother. Whereupon shee condescended, forbearing her exclamations, and surceasing to publish the iniuries shee had receiued in the eares of the people. And thus remained she a long time with her brother Abfalon in the qualitie of a widow.

Dauid hauing intelligence of that which had hapned, was sore displeased, notwithstanding he loued Amnon verie entirely, who was his eldest sonne, and would not disquiet him: but Abfalon hated him extremely, expecting (without any word speaking) for some fit opportunitie, wherein he might reuenge himselfe on the rauisher. Now when as two yeares were expired since his sister was both derided and deslowred, it chaunced that Abfalon intending a sheep-shearing in Bellsphon, a Citie of the tribe of Ephraim, inuited his father and brethren to come and banquet with him.

A him. But when the king refused to go, for feare least he might be chargeable vnto him: Abfalon insisted & perswaded him to send his brothers thither, which hee granted. Hereupon Abfalon commanded his seruants, that when they should see Amnon charged with wine & sleepe, they should sodainly (vpon a signe giuen by him vnto them) kill him without feare or regard of any person.

How thorow the domesticall discord of his family, Dauid was banished by his sonne out of his kingdome.

B After that Abfalons seruants had thus executed his commandement, a trouble and feare seised all the rest of his brethren, inasmuch as they suspected their owne persons: for which cause mounting themselves on horsebacke, they posted all in haste towards their father. But a certaine man outstripping them in the way, reported vnto Dauid that Abfalon had slaine all his sonnes. Who surprisid with a bitter and mortall feare, in supposing that such a number of his children should be slaine, and that by their owne brother, neither inquired the cause or any thing els which might be sifted out in so grievous an inconuenient that had hapned, but gaue himselfe ouer to extreame and strange discomforts, and renting his garments laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both those that were slaine, as him also that had slaine them.
But Jonathan the sonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his passion, could conceiue no probable cause of coniecture. But as touching Amnon there needed no question, for that it was very like that Abfalon (by reason of the iniury which was offered vnto his sister Thamar) would hazard himselfe to kill him. Meane while a great trample of horses, and a confused troupe of men brake off their discourse. These were the kings sonnes, who returned in post from the banquet: Against these the father issued out, accompanying their dolefull teares with a heauy and sorrowfull countenance: and seeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he supposed to be lost, returned in safety, they were all of them on euery side giuen ouer to teares & lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the king his murdered sonne. But Abfalon fled vnto Gessur (vnto his grandfather on the mothers side, and Lord of that place) and sojourned with him three whole yeeres: at the end whereof Dauid determined to send for his sonne Abfalon, not to the intent to punish him, but to retire him vnto him (by reason that the indignation he had conceiued against him, was at that time asslaked) Ioab also furthered this his resolution by all meanes that were to him possible: For hee caused a certaine old woman attired in mourning habit to present her selfe before Dauid, who said vnto him, that betwixt her two sonnes that liued in the countrey, there hapned such a different, that falling to handy-strokes they were so whet the one against the other, that not induring to be parted, the one of the in such sort wounded the other, that he died; and for that the kinsmen were sore moued against the murthe-rer, and sought without mercie to depriue him of life, she humbly belought the king that he would giue her her sonnes life, and not depriue her of that hope that remained her to sustaine her old yeeres with; which he should bring to passe, if so be he prohibited those that would kil her son from executing their intents: for that except it were for feare which they had of him, they would by no meanes be withdrawne from their fatall and bloody resolution. Now when as the king had granted her request, the woman began once more to breake into these speeches: I most humbly thanke your maiestie (said she) who haue had compassion of mineage, and doe so proudly foresee that I be not depriued of my sonne, but to the intent I may be the better assured of thy hu-manitie, I beseech thee (O King) first of all pacifie thy displeasure conceiued against thy sonne, and be no more incensed against him: For how can I perswade my selfe that you will doe me this grace, if you your selfe euen vntill this day continue your displeasure conceiued vpon the like occasion against your sonne? For it is contrarie to the rules of wisdom, to adde to the remedielesse losse of one sonne, the haplesse death of a fathers liuing hope. Vpon these words the king began presently to suspect that Ioab had suborned this woman, and vnderstanding no lesse by the olde womans report, he sent for Ioab, and told him that hee granted him that which he desired, commanding him to send for Abfalon, assuring him that his displeasure was pacified, and choler asswaged. Ioab cast himselfe downe prostrate before the king, and reuerently receiuing his word of reconciliation, went vnto Gessur and fet Abfalon from thence with him, and brought him to Ierusalem. The king vnderstanding that his sonne drew neere, sent out a messenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he should not presume to presse into his presence, because hee was not G disposed to behold him so sodainly. Who vnderstanding the will of his father, forbore to shew himselfe vnto him, and went and dwelt amongst his own familiars and household seruants: Neither was his beauty any waies decreased by the sorrow hee had conceived, or for that his entertainment was farre different from the bringing vp and nourishing of a princes sonne; but he rather excelled and grew more famous thereby: so that for beautie and goodlines of personage he exceeded all those that liued more deliciously and daintily: his glibband or haire was so thicke that it could scarcely be powled in eight daies, & waighed two hundred sicles which amount to five pound. He liued also two yeeres in Ierusalem, and was the father of three sonnes, and one faire daughter, which Roboam the sonne of Salomon afterwards tooke to wife, of whom he begat a sonne called Abia. In proceesse of time hee sent messengers vnto Iob, that now at length hee would pacifie his father, and beseech him to admit him to his presence, that hee might both see and submit himselfe vnto him. But because Iob made small reckoning of these his motions, hee sent of his seruants, and commanded them to burne and spoile Iob's possessions that abutted vpon his: who hearing of that which had hapned vnto him, resorted vnto Abialon, accusing him and questioning with him for what cause hee had done him this iniurie. To whom Abialon answered: I haue (said he) inuented this stratagem to make thee come vnto me, seeing thou madest small account of my commissions, whereby I haue charged thee to reconcile me vnto my father. And at this present I beseech thee that thou wilt moue my father in my behalfe; otherwise I shall thinke my returne more grievous then my banishment hath bene, if so be my father shall as yet continue his displeasure. Iob was perswaded thorow the compassion hee conceived of the necessity wherin he saw him, and went and solicited the king, with whom he so effectually debated and as touching Abialon, that altering his contrarie disposition, hee graciously and speedily sent and called for him. As soone as he came vnto his presence, Abialon cast himselfe prostrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: But David raised and lifted him vp, and promised him that from thenceforth hee would no more vpbraid him with those misdeedes. After all things had thus fallen out, Abialon within a little space assembled a great number of horses and chariots, and entertained fiftie men for his guard, and euery day early in the morning presented himselfe before the kings palace, and talked with those that resorted thither, about the triall of their differences; and whereas some of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found the affected, alledging that his father had no good counsellors, & that perhaps he himselfe had in some things iudged amisse: & by these means in deuoured he to get the goodwill of all men, telling them that if he had the like authority, he would make them know by prooffe what his equity was. Having by these plausible perswasions drawne the hearts of the common people vnto him, he thought himselfe already seised of their seruices in whatsoever he intended. Some foure yeeres after his reconciliation, hee came to his father David, requiring of him that he might goe to Hebron & sacrifice vnto God, according as he had vowed at such time as hee fled from his presence. Which request of his when David granted him, hee resorted thither beeing attended with great affluence and concourse of all the people (by reason he had appointed diuers to meet him in that place, amongst whom was Achitophel the Gelmonite, one of Dauids counsellors, and 200. others of Ierusalem, who altogether ignorant of his enterprize, assembled themselves in that place to be assistant to his sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared king, according as hee himselfe had commanded them to doe. When the newes hereof came vnto Dauids eares, and he was thorowly ascertained beyond all conceit, how his sonne had behaved himselfe; he suspected and doubted his impiety and arrogancy, wondering that he should so soon and so lewdly forget himselfe of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrary to all law plunge himselfe and hazard his reputation in more grievous offences: as first of all to peruert the estate of the kingdom which God had established: and secondly, in complotting to deprime and degrade his owne father. For which cause he determined to fly to the other side of Iordan, conducting with him his most inward & hartie friends, to whom he reported the vnbredled furie of his sonne, remitting all things vnto God who iudgeth all things; and leaving the government of his royall house to the disposition of his sixe concubines, he departed from Ierusalem. With him issued an affectionate and great number of people, besides those sixe hundred soldiers, who had followed him in his banishment during Sauls life time. And although the high priests Abiathar and Sador with all the Leuites had concluded to depart with him, yet perswaded hee them to abide with the Arke, assuring them that God would deliuer them: yea although the Arke were vnremoued from his place. Hee commanded Abiathar likewise to send him private intelligence

A intelligence of each current that should happen, reseruing with him for his intire and inward counsellors Achimaas the sonne of Sador, and Ionathan the sonne of the aboue said Abiathar. But Ethraus the Gittite by no perswasions of the king could bee induced to stay, but contrarie to his commaund followed him, whereby hee more manifestly exprest his affection towards him. But as he mounted and ascended on his bare feet vpon the mountaine of Oliuet, and all they of his traine followed him (intermixing their trauel with bitter teares) a certain messenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Abialon, and held on his side. Which report aggravated and increased his griefe: so that hee besought God that it might please him to alienate the affection of Abialon from Achitophel, for feare least if he should giue him some sinister counsell, he might easily be perswaded thereunto; because that Achitophel was a man of ripe iudgement and ready execution in all that concerned him. As soone as hee came vnto the top of the mountaine, he beheld the Citie: and as if he had vicerly been banished from his kingdom, he began with abundant teares to call vpon GOD. There met hee with Chusai his sincere and vnfaigned friend, vvhom when hee beheld with his garments rent, with ashes on his head, and lamenting the vnhappie change which he then beheld: David cheered him, and exhorted him to bee no waies discouraged; and finally, besought him to returne vnto Abialon, as vnder a colour that hee had forsaken his part, vvhether diligently prying into his secrets, hee might oppose himselfe against Achitophels counsaile, because hee might not so much pleasure him in keeping him company, as in staying with Abialon. Chusai beeing after this manner perswaded by David, returned back to Ierusalem, where presently after he encountered with Abialon, who repaired thither. In the meane time David marching onward a little further, chanced to meet with Siba, Mephiboseths seruant, & Puruicor of all those goods which David had giuen him (for that he was Ionathans son, who was the son of Saul.) This man droue before him two Asses laden with victuals, which he presented to David and his company, to refresh themselves with; and being demanded where hee had left Mephiboseth? In Ierusalem (said he) where he expecteth to be chosen king, thorow the occasion of those troubles that had happened, and in memory of the benefits that diuers men had receiued at Sauls hands. David displeased with that which hee heard, gaue Siba all those riches where-with he had graunted Mephiboseth in times past, deeming him more worthy of the same then Mephiboseth. VVherewith Siba was very highly contented.

When David drew neere vnto a place which is called Choran, a certaine cousin of Sauls, called Dimei, the sonne of Gera, came out against him, and cast stones at him, and reuiled him; and the more Dauids friends inuironed and defended him, the more obstinately perieured hee in his reproofes and scandalous railings: calling him murderer, & captain of the wicked, charging him like an impure and execrable man to get him out of the kingdom, giuing God thanks for that hee had deprimed him of his kingdom by the means of his owne sonne, and in punishment of those crimes which he had committed against his owne maister. This his so cruell and vnbredled libertie, moued all Dauids followers to displeasure; so that all of them were prepared to reuenge them on Simei; and amongst the rest Abisai would haue slaine him: but David pacified his displeasure, willing him to forbear, for feare (said he) least to our present miseries we annexe a further and new occasion. For in as much as concerneth my selfe, I set light by this mad dog, and refer the matter vnto God, who is the cause that he is thus desperately bent against vs. Neither is it to be wondered at, that I suffer these outrages by him, sith mine owne sonne is so wicked as hee taketh a felicitie to disdain me: but it may be that God will haue compassion on vs, & if he please we shall haue the vpper hand ouer our enemies. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei said, who ranne on the other side of the mountaine, railing and reuiling at him. When David was arrived on the banke of Iordan, he mustered and refreshed his armie, who were fore wearied: meane while Abialon entring Ierusalem with Achitophel his Counsellor, was saluted and applauded by the whole concourse of the people; & amongst the rest Dauids friend came vnto them, who prostrating himselfe before Abialons feete, wished him both prosperitie and perpetuie in his kingdom. Him did Abialon aske how it came to passe, that hee who was reputed to be one of Dauids most endeared friends, and esteemed alwaies to be most loiall & faithfull vnto him, should at that time (when most occasion was profered him to expresse his loyaltie) abandon him, and submit himselfe to his enemy? To him Chusai answered both readily and wisely, that it became him to follow God; and the good will of the people.

Sith therefore (said hee, my Soueraigne) that both these are for you, it concerneth me to follow you, because you haue receiued the kingdom from God: If therefore you esteeme mee to be your faithfull friend; I will approue vnto you my loyaltie and true affection in like manner, as in your knowledge I haue testified in effect vnto your father, who ought not to bee displeased at that which hath hapned, since the kingdom is not transported into another house, but remaineth in his owne family, because he who was his sonne receiued the same. By such like words he reconciled himselfe to Abfalon, whereas before that time he was inwardly suspected. Hereupon Achitophel was sent for to consult with him about their affaires in hand: who gaue him counsell to abuse all his fathers concubines, and make them his owne. For, said hee, from that time forward, the people will beleeue that you and hee will neuer bee reconciled; and will bee more readie to beare armes and invade your father for your sake. For hitherto (said he) they haue vnwillingly professed themselves to be his enemies, suspecting least a peace should be concluded betwixt the father and the sonne. Abfalon beleeuing this aduise of his, caused a Tent or roiall Pauilion to be pitched in the sight of all the people, wherinto hee entred, and had the company of his fathers concubines. All which fell out, according as the Prophet Nathan had fore-told, at such time as hee certified Dauid, that his owne sonne should make warre against him.

Abfalons warre against his father: his death, and the discomfiture of his armie.

¶ Hen Abfalon had done that which Achitophel had instructed him in, hee requested him once more to counsaile him concerning that warre which he had enterprised against his father: vvhich required tenne thousand chosen men at his hand, promising him to kill Dauid, and to bring all the rest that were in his conduct vnder his subiection: assuring him that Abfalons kingdom would bee then established, when Dauids head were cut off from his shoulders. Vvhē this aduise of his had highly contented him, he sent for Chusai, who was the chiefe amongst Dauids friends (for so Dauid himselfe had termed him) to whō he discovered the aduise which Achitophel had giuen him, and required him to giue his opinion what he thought thereof: vvhich knowing verie well that if Achitophels counsaile were followed, Dauid should be in danger to be apprehended and slaine, enforced all his arguments & counsailes to the contrary. For, said hee, my Liege, you are sufficiently informed both what your fathers valour is, & their vertue that accompany him; who hath fought many battels, and hath had the vpper hand ouer all his enemies. It is to bee feared also least hee at this present bee incamped in the field. For, hee is well exercised in leading armies, and to prevent any stratagems, whereby the enemy may invade him, & about the euening he hath perhaps left his men hidden in some straight, or in ambush behind some rock: & if our men shall assaile him, his souldiers will by little and little retire, and afterward recouering courage, by reason that the King shall be neere vnto them, they will charge vs afresh; and during their medly, your father will suddainly breake out of his ambush, and encourage his owne men, and discomfirt yours: wisely therefore examine mine aduise, & if you find that it bee good, neglect that which Achitophel hath giuen you. Send mee thorow all the countrey of the Hebrewes, commanding euery one to take armes and march out against your father: and whē you haue gathered together these forces, be you your selfe in person the Generall of the armie, and commit it not to another mans charge, and assuredly expect to haue an easie victorie ouer him, if you assaile him in the open field, for that hee is accompanied with a very few men, and your selfe are attended by many thousands, who at least wile if they loue you, & will shew a good affection towards you, may easily rid you of that enemy. And if so be your father shut himselfe vp in any City, wee will and may subuert the same by mines and engines. This aduise of his seemed to be better then that of Achitophels, so that Abfalon preferred the same. For it was God that put this thought into his hart, to neglect Achitophels, and respect Chusais counsell.

Now when Chusai had thus preuailed, he presently repaired to the high Priests Sadoc and Abiathar, certifying them what Achitophel had comploted, and how he had contradicted him: finally, how his opinion had taken place, giuing them in charge to send priuate intelligence vnto Dauid thereof, and to enforme him of his sonnes resolution, wishing him with all speed to passe ouer the riuer of Iordan, for feare least Abfalon being informed of his aboad in that place, should make haste and pursue him, and ouertake him before hee might recouer a place of securitie.

Now had the high Priests before hand provided that their sonnes should lie hid without the Citie, of set purpose, to the end they might be sent vnto Dauid to informe him how matters went. They therefore sent a trusty seruant vnto these, who brought them newes of Abfalons deliberations, with expresse commandement to enforme the King thereof with all speede, who

A who presently vpon this intelligence, like good and faithfull ministers, posted with all speede to report their fathers newes vnto the king.

But scarcely had they trauelled two furlongs, when certaine horsemen discovered them, and brought newes thereof vnto Abfalon, who presently sent out scouters to apprehend them: which when the children of the high priest perceived, they forsooke the high way, and incontinently retired themselves into a certaine village neere vnto Ierusalem, which is called Bocchura, vvhether they besought a certaine woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of securitie, who let them downe into a pit, and couered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. Shee being demanded by those that pursued them whether she saw the, denied the same, saying, that as soone as she had giuen them drinke, they departed from her presently; assuring them that if they presently and speedily pursued the, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not find them, they returned from whence they came: The woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cause of feare, least the young men should be surprisid, she drew them out of the pit, and sette them onward of their way: who, with as great speed as was possible, resorted vnto Dauid, and declared vnto him exactly what Abfalons deliberation was. Hereupon Dauid passed the fload Iordan presently with all his men, and although it were night could not be withdrawne by reason of the darknesse.

But Achitophel seeing that his opinion had beene reproued, tooke his horse and suddainely repaired vnto his country of Gelmon: there calling together his household seruants before him, he discovered vnto them what aduise he had giuen Abfalon; vvhich since hee had not accepted, he told the that shortly they should see him dead, alleading that Dauid would haue the vpper hand in the warre, and should returne into his kingdom. It is better therefore, said he, for mee with a great mind, and as it becommeth a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my selfe to Dauids punishment for partaking with Abfalon, and giuing him counsell. This said, hee retired himselfe into the most secret part of his house, and hung himselfe, being both his owne iudge and executioner: after which, his kinsmen cut him downe & buried him. But Dauid (as we said) hauing past Iordan, came and incamped in a strong Cittie, the most defended in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great beneuolence by all the noble men of that country, partly moued thereunto by the mans present necessitie, partly thorow the reuerence of his former felicitie. These were Bersillai the Galaadite, Siphai the gouernour of the prouince of the Ammonites, & by the peeres. D Machir the chiefe of the country of Galaad, who gaue Dauid and his whatsoeuer they wanted, in abundance: so that they lacked neither beds, nor bread, nor flesh, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sick and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serue for repose or refectiō. In this estate remained he. But Abfalon assembled a great multitude of people to make warre vpon his father; and after he had passed Iordan, he pitched his tents neere vnto his fathers, within the country of Galaad, and made Amasa Generall of his armie, oppoling him against Iobab his cosin: for Amasas father was Iethar, & his sister was Abigail, sister to Sarnia, moe than to Iobab. When Dauid had mustered and numbred his forces, and found that hee had fortie thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently to hazard battell, and not to expect till Abfalon should charge vpon them.

E Hee therefore ordained Coronels ouer thousands of his men, and diuided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gaue in charge to Iobab, the second to Abisai his brother; and the third to Ethaus his familiar friend (who was of the citie of Geth.) In this battell his friends would not admit his presence (and that vpon good and deepe consideration) for they said, that if they should bee defeated in his company, they should vtterly lose all good hope: but if one Squadron should be overcome, the rest might haue their recourse vnto him, who might assemble vnto them and strengthen them with greater force, the rather for that the enemies would alwaies thinke it likely, that he had some other armie with him. This counsell of theirs seemed pleasing vnto him, for which cause he remained within the Citie. But at such time as he sent out his friends vnto the battell, he besought them that (in remembrance of all the benefits and fauours hee had bestowed on them) they would both shew themselves courageous & faithfull men in the fight, and that hauing obtained the victory, they would spare his sonne, for feare least his death should increase and redouble his discontents. Thus praying God to giue them victorie, hee dismissed them to enter the battell. But when as Iobab had planted his armie right ouer against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plaine, hauing a wood vpon their backs; Abfalon also drew out his armie against him. So that encountering, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazarding themselves in all dangers, and employing playing all their affections, to the intent that Dauid might recouer his kingdome: the others neither refusing to doe or endure any thing, so that Abfalon might not bee deprived, or exposed to his fathers punishment and displeasure for his insolent attempt. Besides that, they held it an indignitie for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be surmounted by such a handfull of people as followed Ioab: deeming it to be an vtter disgrace vnto them, that being so many thousands of them in armes, they should be discomfited by Dauids followers.

But Ioab and his men being more skilfull and trained in feates of armes then the rest, discomfited and brake Abfalons army: so that they fled thorow woods and steepe places. Dauids soul-diers pursuing after them, tooke some, and slew other some; so that both in flight & fight, a great number of them were put to the sword: for there fell that day about twenty thousand men. But all Dauids troups freshly set vpon Abfalon, who was easily knowne by reason of his absolute beauty, and high stature: he fearing to be surprised by his enemies, mounted vpon the roial mule, and fled in great haste. And for that by swift motion of his body, his locks were scattered abroad, his bush of haire was entangled in a thick and branchie tree, where hee hung after a strange manner, and his mule ranne onward with great swiftnesse, as if shee had as yet borne her Maister on her back: but he hanging by the haire amidst the branches, suddainly fell into his enemies hands.
This when a certaine souldier perceiued, he brought newes thereof vnto Ioab, who promised him to giue him sicke sicles, if he would kill him.

The souldier answered, that if he would giue him two thousand hee would not commit such a murther on the sonne of his Soueraigne, the rather for that in the presence of them all, Dauid had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Ioab commanded him to shew him the place where hee had seen Abfalon hang: who no sooner discovered him, but thrusting a Iauelin to his hart, hee slew him. That done, Ioabs Elquires surrounding the tree tooke him downe; & casting him into a deep & obscure pit, they ouerwhelmed him with stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a tomb, or some great, high, and stately monument. After this, when Ioab had sounded the retreat, hee with-drew his souldiers from pursue, supposing it to be an innaturall thing for one countryman to flesh himselfe vpon another. Abfalon had erected in the roiall valley two furlongs distant fro Ierusalem a Marble pillar, which he had intituled by the name of Abfalons Hand; saying, that when his children should be dead, his name should remaine in that pillar. Now he had three sons, and a daughter which was called Thamar, as we haue said heretofore, who was married vnto Ro-boam, Dauids Nephew, and had by him a son called Abia, who succeeded his father in the kingdome: of whom we will speake more conueniently in his place.

CHAP. X.

The happy estate of Dauid being restored vnto his kingdome.

Chusai sent to certifie Dauid of the victory.

After that Abfalon was slaine, all the people returned priuately to their owne houses: but Achimaas the son of the high priest Sadoc drew neere vnto Ioab, requiring his li-cencie to repaire vnto Dauid, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods help and prouidence he had obtained the victory. This did the Generall deny him, telling him that it was not conuenient that he, who before times was wont to bring ioyful newes, should now certifie the king of his sons death. He therefore commanded him to stay, and calling Chusai to his presence, he gaue him commission to certifie the king of that which he had scene. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to go, promising him that he would make no mention but of the victory; & that as touching Abfalons death, he would not vtter any thing: whereupon he dismissed him also, who chusing the shorter way (which he onely knew) outstripped Chusai. Now as Dauid late in the gate of the Cittie (expecting some messenger that might certifie him of the successe of the battell) one of the Sentinels perceiuing Achimaas, that came running hastily, and vnable to discouer who it was, told Dauid that he saw a messenger coming towards him, who answered that it was some one that brought ioyful newes. Anon after he told him that a certaine other messenger followed: To whom Dauid answered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceiued that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the high priests son, and that he was neere at hand, he ran first of all and certified Dauid, who was very glad thereof, saying that he brought some good and desired newes as touching the euent of the battell: and no sooner had the king spoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himselfe vpon his face before Dauid, to whom he reported that his armie had the victory. Being afterwards

Afterwards demanded what was become of Abfalon: He answered, that he incontinently departed from the camp as soone as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certaine cry of soul-diers that pursued Abfalon: and further then that, he knew nothing, because by Ioabs commandement he was speedily sent away to bring tidings of the victorie. When Chusai was come and had humbled himselfe before the King, and had declared vnto him the successe of the battell, the question was asked how Abfalon did: Whereunto he answered, The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Abfalon. These words quite extinguished the delight and ioy that Dauid conceiued in the victorie, & wholly amated his faithfull souldiers: for as touching the king, he ascending the highest part of the Cittie, bewailed his sonne, bearing his breast, rearing his haire, and afflicting himselfe in all kinds, and after such a sort, as may not bee exprest; and B crying out in a most mournful manner: My sonne (said he) would GOD my sonne that I were dead with thee, that I might bewith thee. For whereas of his owne nature hee was a verie louing man, yet loued he Abfalon aboute all other most tenderly.

When the armie and Ioab were informed that Dauid lamented his sonne in this sort, they had this respect, that they would not enter the Cittie after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them most tenderly, as if they had returned from some discomfiture. But when as the king hauing his head couered, persecuted in his desire to bewaile his sonne, Ioab entred in vnto him and said: O King, you consider not that in this be-hauour of yours, you dishonour your selfe: for it is to bee thought that you hate those that loue you, and expose themselves to all perils for your loue; yea that you hate your selfe and your own C succession: and that contrariwise, you loue your most mortall enemies most intirely, such you bewaile them that were no lesse, & who are iustly deprived of their liues. For if Abfalon had had the victorie, and had possessed the kingdome in assurance, there had not any one of vs bene left aliue that loue you, but had all of vs suffered a most hated death; nay, and in the first ranke your selfe & your owne children: neither would they being our enemies haue lamented; but laughed at our deaths; yea they would punish them likewise who should haue any compassion of our miseries: yet art thou not ashamed to lament after this manner, for such a man as most extremely hated thee, who notwithstanding he were thine owne sonne, was so vngratefull & vngracious towards thee. Desist therefore from thy vniust lamentation, and offer thy selfe in preface to thy weldeserving souldiers, and giue them thanks, that by their vertue haue obtained thee this victorie: o-D therwise, if thou continue as thou hast begonne, this day will I translate both the kingdome and the armie from thee, and giue thee occasion more grieuouly and truly to lament thee of thy misfortunes then thou didst before. By these words Ioab pacified and alaid the Kings lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common weale: for clothing himselfe in a royall habite, whereby he might seeme more gracious in the sight of his souldiers, he sate him downe in the gate: so that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to salute him.

Whilst these things past after this manner, they that remained aliue of Abfalons armie, returning home vnto their houses, sent their messengers to euery corporation, aduertising them how many benefits they had receiued at Dauids hands, and how after many & grieuous warres, he had brought them to a secure libertie, and how vniustly expelling him, they had committed the king-E dome vnto another. For which cause it behooued them, such hee was dead whom they had chosen, to make their supplication and submission vnto Dauid, that dismissing his wrath, hee would receiue the people into his fauour, and according as before time, so now also he would vouchsafe them his pardon and protection. Of these things sundry intelligences came vnto the kings eare; so that by expresse letters he commaunded Sadoc and Abiathar the chiefe priests, that they should certifie the princes of the tribe of Iuda, that it should be a great indignity for the, that other tribes should preferre Dauid to the kingdom before them, especially sith he was both of their tribe, and their kinsman also. In like manner he commaunded them to speak vnto Amasa the generall, and expostulate with him, vwhy hee who was his Nephew by the sisters side, did not perswade the armie to recomend the kingdom to his hands: willing them to assure him that he was not onely F to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but also for the government of the vvhole armie, according as Abfalon had granted him. Hereupon the high priests not onely conferred with the Princes afore said, but also informed Amasa what the king had promised in his behalfe, whereby they drew him to their faction. And first of all, those of his owne tribe reuoked Dauid very instantly into the kingdome: the rest of the Israelites, by their example and Amasas authoritie, did the like also; and these Embassadors flocked vnto him to receiue him into Ierusalem. But vpon derfull and praise-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Iuda, who went out as far as the bank of the flood, of Iordan to meete with him, with these came Simei the sonne of Gera, with a thousand men, G which he had brought with him of the tribe of Beniamin. Siba likewise Sauls freema came thither with his fifteene sonnes, & twentie seruants: who made a bridge ouer Iordan, that the king might with his more easily passe ouer both himselfe and his armie. As loone as he came vnto Iordan, he was saluted by the tribe of Iuda: and Simei marching onward on the bridge, and prostrating himselfe at the kings feet, asked pardon of his offences, & besought him to remit his displeasure: and that in recouering his authoritie, hee would not first of all doe iustice on him, but that hee should remember this also, that he being induced by the repentance of his error, did with the formost march out to meete him vpon his returne. Whilst thus he besought and lamented, Abisai, Iaabs brother spake after this manner. Why should he nor die that hath thus villainously outraged the king, whom God hath established? But Dauid turned back vnto him and said: Ye sonnes of Ser. H uia, will you neuer cease to hatch new troubles; and to adde new diuisions to your former com- motions? Know you not that this is the first day of my raigne? For which cause I sweare an oath that I wil pardon all them that haue committed any impietie against me, & that no one man shall depart from me in my disfaueur. For which cause be of good cheere Simei, & feare thou not that I will seek thy blood. Whereupon he adored the king & marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboseth, Sauls nephew came out to meet him, clothed in a desolate and forrowfull manner. For since the time that Dauid fled his haire hanging downe in a neglected & forrowfull manner. For since the time that Dauid fled & forooke the citie, he had in such sort been distressed, that he neither had trimmed his haire, nor changed or cleansed his garment, supposing this calamitie & deposition to rouch him as neerly as it did the king: and further, in that by Siba his steward, he had been vniustly, detracted & accused I to the king. After he had prostrated himselfe, & adored the king, Dauid asked him for what cause he forooke him in his troubles, and offered nor himselfe to accompany him in his flight? Who answered, that it was the wickednes of Siba, who was the cause thereof: for he, said he, being co- maunded to prepare my necessities for that iourney, neglected the execution thereof, contem- ning both me and it, as if I had bene some abiect slave: Otherwise had I had the vse of my feet, and the meanes to haue waited on thee in thy iourney, I had neuer endured to haue forsaken thee. Neither was hee contented (my Liege) to hinder my deuout seruice toward thee, but further, more, hee hath maliciously incensed your Maiestie against me: yet knowe I well that your wife dome will not admit or giue credit to his detractions, both for that you are iust, as also for that G O D and truth which you onely aspire to, are onely beloued by you. For, whereas during my K Grandfathers daies, you were alwaies conuerfant amongst the most difficult dangers, and fol- lowed and attempted by him, and whereas all our posteritie by that meanes deserued to be utterly extinguished, yet haue you vied both in moderation & meeknesse, especially in forgetting those in- dignities; at such time as the memory thereof afforded you meanes to punish them. And now withstanding all these things, you haue entertained me like your friend, feasted mee at your daile table, and dignified mee with no lesse honours, then if I had bene one of your neereft and deereft kinsmen. When Dauid had heard these things, he neither thought good to punish Mephiboseth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accused him, but after he had certified him that he had giuen Siba all his goods, yet did hee pardon him, and promise him the restitution of halfe his possessions. Whereunto Mephiboseth replied. Let Siba (saith hee) possesse the whole, it one- L lie sufficeth mee that I see your Maiestie restored againe into your kingdome. After this, Dauid inuited Berzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man and of great authoritie, and by whose bountie during the time of his warre he was assisted, and who had attended him as farre as Iordan) to accompany him vnto Ierusalem, promising him to make no lesse account of him then of his father, and assuring him liberally to allow him in all things that concerned his honour and age. But hee being desirous to liue in priuate, besought his Maiestie to dismisse him from the Court, because (as hee said) his age was so extream as it made him vnapt for courtly pleasures, considering that hee had attained to the age of fourscore yeeres: alledging that it better became him to thinke of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cause he besought Dauid to fauour him so much as that he might gouerne himselfe according to his owne desire, because that by reason of his age, he neither knew how to fauour meate nor drinke: besides, for that his hearing was lost, so that hee could not distinguish nor discern the sound of instruments, vvherein they who conuerse in kings Courts doe most vsually take such delight.

To this Dauid replied. Sith (said he) thou doost so instantly request me to giue thee leaue to depart from me, I dismisce thee: but leaue thou thy son *Achimaa*s with me, who shall bee maister of my many fauours. Hereupon Berzillai left his son with him, and taking leaue of the king (with meet this king.

A prayer that God would grant him the fulnes of al his desires) he returned to his owne house. But Dauid went vnto Galgal (hauing already the halfe part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Iuda.) Thither resorted then vnto him the chiefe gouernours of that countrey, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining vpon the tribe of Iuda, for that vnwitting to the rest they had resorted to him, when as by a mutuall consent they should all of them haue met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Iuda requested the in no sort to misconstrue their preuention of them. For that by reason of alliance they had done this office, whereby being tied vnto him they were bound with more feruent studie to doe him seruice: for neither in respect of that diligence of theirs recieued they any rewards, whereby they that came after should thinke themselves preiudicte in profit. This answer of theirs the princes of the tribes tooke not in good part, but thus they spake vnto their brethren: Wee wonder (said they) that you only challenge the king to bee your kinsman, as if hee were not to be accounted an allic vnto vs all, whom God hath equally placed to be gouernour ouer vs all; when as therefore the whole people consisteth of eleuen parts, you onely are but one; besides, we are your elders: so that you haue not dealt vprightly in that you haue secretly and couertly sought out the king. Whilst the gouernours in this sort debated the matter with them, a certaine wicked and seditious person called Siba, the sonne of Bochri of the tribe of Beniamin, standing vp in the midst of the people began to cry out with a loud voice, and to exclaime after this manner. Wee haue no part with Dauid, nor inheritance with the sonne of Iesse. This said, he founded a trumpet, and proclaimed warre against the king, so that all men followed him, and forooke Dauid. Onely the tribe of Iuda remained with him, and established him in the royall throne in Ierusalem: where removing his concubines (which his son Abisai had knowen) out of his palace, hee neuer after that time had any company with them. After this hee declared Amasa generall of the armie, and placed him in the same degree, which Iaob had, neere vnto the person of the King: commanding him that he should assemble the greatest forces that he might out of the tribe of Iuda, and that within three daies he should returne vnto him, to the end that hauing deliuered him both the armie & the place of generall, hee might send him to make warre vpon the son of Bochri. After that Amasa was departed, & employed his time in gathering vp his armie; the king seeing that hee failed to returne vpon the third day, told Iaob that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater head by delay, & thereby breede vs of Amases more trouble and molestation then Abisai had don. For which cause (said he) stay thou not but delay islent out against Si- baby Dauid.

D take vnto thee those forces which thou hast in readines, and may fixe hundred men with thy brother Abisai, and pursue thou the enemy, and in what place soeuer thou meereft him, by all meanes indeuour thy selfe to giue him the battell. Hasten thee therefore, and ouertake him, for feare lest hee seize some of our strongest Cities, and thereby procure vs much trauell and labour. Iaob with all expedition obeyed his commandement, and tooke with him the aforesaid fixe hundred, with his brother Abisai, and commanded all the forces that were in Ierusalem to follow after him, and in this array issued hee after Siba. Now when hee came vnto Gabaon (a borough, some forty furlongs distant frō Ierusalem) Amasa came & met with him, & brought with him great forces: Iaob hauing his sword girt by his side, and his cures on his backe; whilest Amasa came onward to salute him, subtiltie and of set purpose let his sword slip out of his sheath, and taking it vp from the ground with one hand hee drew neere vnto Amasa, vnder pre- Iacob killed Amasa.
tence to kisse him on the chin, and sodainly thrust the sword that was in his other hand into his belly and slew him. Which action of his was both hainous and detestable, proceeding from a ialousie he had conceiued against a good yong man and his couzen, who had in no sort offended him, and onely by reason of the estate of generall, which the king had giuen him; and because Dauid had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cause before that, hee had slaine Abner. Notwithstanding this act of his seemed in some sort pardonable, by reason of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done vnto his brother Azazel, yet was not this a sufficient colour to excuse the murder of Amasa. Vhen this was done, he pursued Siba, and left a certaine man to wait vpon the body of Amasa, who had commandement giuen him to proclaime with a loud voice thorow the whole army, that he was iustly and deseruedly slaine, commanding those that bare any fauour to the kings title, to follow their generall Iaob and his brother Abisai. Now whilest his body lay thus in the way, & all the multitude (as it is vsual in such like accidents) flocked round about it, he that had the charge of the bodie tooke it vp, & bare it into a certaine place farre out of the way, & couered it with a garment: which done all the people followed Iaob.

Now whilest he pursued Siba thorow all the region of the Israelites, a certain man told him that he had retired himself into a certaine strong citie called Abelmachai; where he no sooner arrived;

but that he begitt the Citie, and entrenched it round about; commanding his souldiers to vndermine and ouerthrow the walles: for hee was sore displeased because they had shut the gates against him. But a certaine honest and prudent woman, seeing her country in extreme perill, ascended the walles and called Ioaab and his souldiers to a parlee; who comming forth to conferre with him, she spake after this manner: God (said she) ordained kings and generals of armies, to the end they might destroy the enemies of the Hebrewes, and plant amongst them an vniuersall and perpetuall peace; but you inforce your selues to destroy one of the mother Cities of Israel, that hath in no sort offended you. Ioaab praised God to be fauourable vnto them, and said that for his owne part it was not his meaning that any one of the Citie should die, neither his pretence to raze and deface so famous a Citie; his intent was only, that if Siba the sonne of Bochri, and the kings aduerlarie were deliuered into his hands so doe iustice on him, he would leuie the siege, & cause his armie to retire from thence. When the woman had heard what Ioaab had said, she praised him to stay a little while, promising him incontinently to cast his head ouer vnto him. Whereupon she came downe amongst the assembly of the Citizens, to whom shee spake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miserably suffer your wiues and children to be slaine for a wicked mans cause, and a stranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of Dauid your king, from whose hands you haue receiued so many benefites? thinke you that one onely Citie can resist so huge an armie? After this manner perswaded she them to cut off Sibas head, and to cast it into Ioaabs campe: which done, Ioaab commanded the retreat to be sounded, and leuied the siege, and returning backe into Ierusalem, was once more declared Generall of all the people. The king also appointed Banaia captaine of his guards, and of fixe hundred souldiers. Adoram was made treasurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achilus had the charge of remembrancers. Susa was made lecretarie. Sadoc and Abiathar were made the high Priests. After this it hapned that the country was afflicted with a famine: For which cause Dauid belought God that he would haue compassion on his people, and that it might please him to manifest not onely the cause, but also the remedie of that maladie. The Prophets answered him, that God would be reuenged of the wrong done vnto the Gabeonites, whom king Saul had deceived and traiterously slaine, without respect of the oath, which the gouernor Iosuah and the elders made vnto them. If therefore he would suffer the Gabeonites to reuenge the death of their slaughtered friends according to their desire, God had promised to bee appealed, and to deliuer the people from their imminent and present euils. As soone as he vnderstood by the Prophets what God required, he sent for the Gabeonites, & asked them what it was which they required: who wished him to deliuer into their hands seuen of Sauls sonnes to take their reuenge on them: whereupon the king made search after them, onely sparing and protecting Mephiboseth the sonne of Ionathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold on these seuen, they executed them according to their pleasures: and thereupon God incontinently sent downe raine and disposed the earth to beare fruit; moistning and alaying the drouth forepassed, so that the land of the Hebrewes recovered againe his pristine fruitfulness. Not long after, the king made warre vpon the Philistines, and at such times as the battell was stricken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chaunced that the king hotly pursuing the chase was left alone, and discouered in his wearinesse by one of the enemies called Acmon, the sonne of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beside his sword had a iauelin, the point whereof waighed three hundredth sicles, & a corselet tissued with chaines, who returning backe charged Dauid very violently, with an intent to kill the king of his enemies, by reason that hee saw him spent with trauell. But about the same instant, Abisai Ioaabs brother arriued in the place, who stept betweene them and rescued the king, and slew his enemy. The whole army for a little space were grieuously discomforted, in regard of the danger, wherein the king had bene, & the gouernors swore that he should neuer afterwards enter into battell with them, for feare least he might fall into some disaster, by reason of his readines and valour, and by that means should deprive the people of those gifts which were in him, which hee had already made them feele, and wherof hereafter they should be made partakers, if God should vouchsafe him a long and blessed life. The king hauing intelligence that the Philistines were assembled in the citie of Gazara, sent out an army against them, in which Sabach the Hittite, one of Dauids redoubted and picked souldiers behaued himselfe very valiantly, and gat great reputation; for he slew diuers of them that vaunted themselves to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed up with presumption of their valour, and was chiefe authour of that victory which the Hebrewes had.

After this last receiued losse, the Philistines once more hazarded their fortunes in warre, against against who when Dauid had sent out an army, Nephanus his kinsman shewed himselfe very valiant: For fighting hand to hand against him that was accounted the most valiant champion amongst all the Philistines, hee slew him, and put the rest to flight; of whom verie many died in that battell also. In procelle of time they encamped neere vnto a Citie not far from the frontiers of the country of the Hebrewes: In which armie of theirs there was a man six cubits hie, who had on either foote and either hand, a finger more then accustomed bequest of nature afforded him. Against him Jonathan the son of Sama (one of those that were sent by Dauid in this army) fought hand to hand & slew him: so that approving himselfe to be the meane of that victorie, hee bare away the honor of the battell, and praise of his valour: for this Philistine boasted likewise that he was descended from the race of the Giants. After this battell they warred no more on the Israelites. Hereupon Dauid, deliuered from war and danger, and euer after enioying a perfect peace, composed Odes and hymnes in praise of God, in diuers kindes of verse: for some are of three, or other some are of five measures. He made instruments also, and taught the Leuites to praise God vpon them, on the Sabbath daies and other feasts. The forme of these instruments was after this manner. The Cinnare is composed of ten strings, and is plaid vpon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelue sounds or cords, and is stricken with the fingers. The Cimbals were large & great and made of brasse, of which it sufficeth in this sort to make some mention, least the nature of those instruments should wholly be unknowne. Now all those that were about the king were valiant men: but amongst all the rest, there were eight most notable and heroike men. The noble actions of fise of which I will declare, because they might suffice to exemplifie the vertues that were in the other that remained: for they were capable to gouerne a country, and to conquer diuers nations. The first of them was Effemas the son of Achemias, who hauing very oftentimes thrust himselfe into the midst of his disordered enemies, neuer gaue ouer fighting til he had slaine nine hundredth of them. After him was Eleazar the sonne of Dodeias, who had accompanied the king in Sarphat. He in a certaine battell (wherein thorow the huge multitude of the enemies, the Israelites were affrighted and put to flight) onely kept his place and affronted the enemy, and rushing in amongst them made a great slaughter of them: so that thorow the great quantitie of blood which he shed, his sword stuck fast to his hand; and the Israelites seeing the Philistines put to flight by him, came downe and ranne vpon them, and obtained a miraculous and famous victorie ouer them. For Eleazar slaughtered those that fled, and the rest of the army followed and spoiled those that were slaine. The third was the sonne of Hus called Sebas, who fighting against the Philistines, in a place called the Lawe (and seeing the Hebrewes to bee afraid of their power, and almost out of heart) resisted them alone, as if he had bin an arraigned army, and slew some of them, and pursued and put the rest to flight, in that they were vnable to sustaine his force and violence. These three exploited with their owne hands these execucious of warre: About that time that the king liued in Ierusalem, the army of the Philistines came out to make warre vpon him, and Dauid (as we haue declared heretofore) was gone vp into the higher citie to aske counsell of God, what the event of that warre should bee; and the enemies being incamped in that valley (that extendeth it selfe as farre as Bethleem, a Citie some twenty furlongs distant from Ierusalem) Dauid said to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was born, and especially that which is in the pit which is neere vnto the gate, if any one will bring mee of that water to drinke, I will esteeme it more then if hee gaue mee great riches. These three men hearing these words, instantly ran out, and past thorow the enemies campe, and went to Bethleem: where hauing drawne water, they returned backe vnto the king, falling thorow the midst of their enemies, bringing newes that the Philistines being afraid of their hardinesse, and great courage, kept themselves vpon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithstanding their small number. But the king tasted not of this water which they brought him, saying that it was bought with the danger of mens liues, and therefore that it was no reason he should drinke thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation vnto God; giuing him thanks because he had deliuered his seruants. After these three followed Abisai Ioaabs brother, who slew six hundredth of the enemy in one day. The fift was Banaia of the race of the Leuites, who being defied by certaine brothers, famous amongst the Moabites for their vertue, ouercame them. Moreover, a certaine Egyptian of a wonderful stature, hauing defied him (notwithstanding the said Banaia was naked and the other armed) yet charged he him, and tooke away his iauelin and slew him. To these foresaid actes of his, a man may annex this as the most valiant, or very neerely equalling the rest. For it came to passe, that after a certaine snowe a Lyon tolsing amidst the flakes thereof, fell into a pit (whose mouth was so narrow, that a man could not discern where it was, especially

The thirtie three other were of like valour and vertue. But King Dauid being desirous to know how many thousands of men he could number amongst the people, and forgetting the commaundement ordained by God for euery head halfe a sicke) hee commaunded Iobab to goe and number all the people: and although Iobab had manifestly proued vnto him that it was a thing no waies necessary; yet could he not perswade him, but that he enioyned him with all expedition, to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrewes.

The summe of the Israelites that were numbered.

Dauid hauing election of three sorts of punishment chose the plague.

A huge slaughter of those that died of the pestilence that was inflicted by God Dauid prayed for the innocent people.

A commaundement to build an altar.

Hereupon Iobab tooke with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuted all the country of the Hebrewes, to know how many men there were: and at the end of nine moneths and twenty daies, he returned to Ierusalem to the king; and presented him with the list of the people, the tribe of Beniamin only excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Leui.) This done, the king perceiuing that he had displeased God, was very sorrowfull and penitue. The route of the other Israelites was of nine hundred thousand men, able to beare armes, and to follow the warre, besides that the only tribe of Iuda contained 400 thousand men. When the Prophets had certified Dauid how God was displeased with him, he began to pray & beseech him that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad vnto him, who brought him the choice of three things, willing him to make election which of the three he would endure: either that famine for seven yeeres space should raigne in his countries; or that warre for three moneths space should afflict the same, wherein he should haue the worst; or that the plague & pestilence should for three daies space raunge amongst the Hebrewes. Being thus distraught and troubled by reason of his difficult election, amidst these imminent miseries; and the Prophet vrging him to returne a short answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the king bethinking him that if he should aske famine, hee should rather seeme to respect his owne securitie, then the common-weale, in that no daunger might by that meanes touch him, for that he had great store of corne in his barne, and they vnfurnished; and if for three moneths he should make choise to be ouercome by the enemy, in that case also he might seeme to haue care of himselfe, in that he had many strong Castles and a valiant guard of men to attend his person: he therefore made choise of a plague, that was both as incident to the prince, as the subiect; wherein each man was touched with equall and imminent feare: saying, that it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had receiued this answer from him, hee reported it vnto God; who sent a plague and mortallitie amongst the Hebrewes, whereby they died after diuers manners: so that it was very hard to discern the malady; which being but one kinde, yet notwithstanding seised the people by tenne thousand causes, and vnknown occasions. For one of them died after another, and the sickness surprising them at vnwares, brought a sodain dissolution of the spirits, and swooning vpon them; so that some of them gaue vp the ghost with grievous torments, and most strange dolours. Others were presently parched vp thorow the burning agonies they endured, and (vnrecoerable by any counsell or remedy) consumed away amidst their languishing fits and tortures. Others died strangled, hauing their eies sodainly darkned and blinded. Other some giuing order for the buriall of their household seruants, died before they were thorowly interred; & from the day brake (at which time the pestilent mortallitie began to rage) vntill dinner time, there died seventy thousand persons. And now had the Angell of God stretched out his hand ouer Ierusalem, ready to inflict punishment thereon, when as the king put on sackcloth and prostrated himselfe on the ground, beseeching and praying God that it would please him to surcease his wrath, and be pacified with the number of those that were already consumed by the pestilence. Whilst thus hee prayed, lifting vp his eyes, he beheld the angell of God houering in the ayre ouer Ierusalem, with his naked sword: whereupon he besought God and said, that it was hee, that was the shepheard, who had deserued to be punished, and not his flocke; who ought to be fauoured in that they had not any waies offended, praying him to satisfie his displeasure vpon him and his posteritie, and to spare the people.

Hereupon God accepting his prayer, surceased the plague, and sent the Prophet Gad vnto him, commanding him that hee should presently repaire to the threshing floore of Oronna the Iebusite, and there build an altar, on which he should offer sacrifice vnto God. Which when Dauid

Dauid vnderstood, hee neglected not this ordinance, but went presently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threshed his corne) saw the king (accompanied by his sonnes) comming towards him, he ranne out to meete him, and humbled himselfe before him. This man was by nation a Iebusite, & one of the greatest friends that Dauid had (by meanes whereof he left him vnspoiled at such time as the fortresse of the Iebusites was taken, as we haue heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cause his Lord came thus vnto him, who was his seruant? Dauid answered him that it was to this intent, that hee might purchase his threshing floore, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer sacrifice vnto God. Oronna replied, that both his floore, chariots, and oxen were the kings to offer vp for a burnt sacrifice, beseeching GOD that he would graciously accept that offering. To this the king answered, that hee highly esteemed his simplicitie and magnanimitie, and that he fauourably respected the offer hee had made him, yet that it was his pleasure that he should receiue the price of the same, because he held it an inconuenient to offer sacrifice vnto God vpon other mens charges. To this Oronna answered, that his Maiestie might doe as best pleased him. Hereupon he bought the foresaid floore of him for fiftie sicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place and offered sacrifices thereon, as well burnt offerings as other sacrifices for prosperitie: and by this meanes the diuine maiestie was appeased, and euer after shewed himselfe fauourable. (Now this place was the very same, whereto Abraham in times past had brought his sonne Isaac to offer him vp for a burnt sacrifice vnto God, and as he was about to sacrifice him, a Wether vpon the instant presented it selfe vnto the Altar, which Abraham offered vp in steede of his sonne, as we haue heretofore made manifest.) Dauid seeing that God had heard his prayer, and fauourably accepted his sacrifice, decreed that in that place the generall Altar of the people should stand, and that on the very same floore hee would build a Temple vnto GOD: which wordes of his God afterwards ratified. For sending his Prophet vnto him, hee certified him that his sonne that should succede him, should build a Temple. After this propheticall declaration, the King commaunded to number the inhabitants of Ierusalem, and it was found that they were one hundred and foure score thousand men: of which number hee appointed eightie thousand to intend the hewing of stones; and ordered that the rest of the common people should beare stones vnto them: & he appointed three thousand and fise hundred, who should gouerne them, and haue the ouersieing of the workes. Hee gathered also a great quantitie of Iron and brasse, to worke vpon, with store of huge & mighty Cedar trees, which they of Tyre and Sidon sent him, whome hee had put in trust to furnish him therewith; telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his sonne should fortune to gouerne after him, he might haue stuffe in a readines for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that hee being as yet yong & vnexperimented, should not bee troubled with the gathering thereof, but hauing all things in a readinesse, might finish the building of the Temple.

DDauid calling vnto him his sonne Salomon, he charged him that after his decess, and his enstalmēt in the kingdome, he should build a temple vnto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to performe the same; yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had bene soyled with slaughters, & brought vp in warre. Adding further, that it was foreprophecied vnto him, that the finishing of that edifice was by Gods ordinance reserved to his younger son that should be called Salomon, whom God should no less tender & care for, then the father doth his sonne: & how the whole land of the Hebrews should be made happy vnder this Prince; & among all other benefits, that they should haue peace (which is an especial prerogative & blessing) and not onely be freed from foraine warres, but also from ciuill dissensions: For which cause (said he) since by God thou wert appointed King before thou wast borne, indeuour thy selfe to be capable and worthy to bee conducted by his prouidence, by honouring pietie, iustice and fortitude, & keeping those his ordinances and lawes, which he gaue vs by Moses, and not permitting others to transgresse the same. shall depart out of this world, I will set all things in a readinesse for thee. Knowe therefore that I haue already gathered ten thousand talents of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of siluer; of brasie and yron there is as much, which is a thing innumerable; of stone and of wood, a matter most incredible. Moreouer, thou shalt haue many thousands of masons and carpenters, and if ought be defectiue besides these, thou shalt thy selfe make prouision thereof: when thou hast performed this, thou shalt bee gracious in Gods sight, who shall be thy soueraigne & safe conductor. Hee exhorted also the gouernours of the people to set to their helping hand, and yield their assistance to his sonne in finishing this worke, and in furthering the seruice of God without suspicion of any inconuenience; assuring them that they should enioy a firme peace, & a flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth vpon those that studie after pietie and iustice.) Moreouer hee charged him to place the Arke within the Temple at such time as it should bee finished, with all other sacred vtenils, for the receit whereof the Temple should long since haue been builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods commaund, who had enioyned them, that at such time as they should possesse their enemies land, they should build him a Temple. These were Dauids exhortations, not onely vnto his sonne, but also to the other Princes.

Now when Dauid was very old, so that by reason of his yeeres his body was so cold and benumbed, that notwithstanding the many couerings and clothes they laid vpon him, yet could hee not be hot or warmed: his Physicians assembled themselves together and consulted, and at last concluded, that one of the fairest virgins that was in the countrey, might be chosen out to lie with the king: because by this meanes he might warme his chill lims, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damzell called Abisage, which surpassed al other in beautie, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was vnable to haue the vse of a woman. But of this virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

The fourth sonne of Dauid was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias, the son of Aegistha, who (resembling Abisalon in complexion and ambition) beganne to vsurpe, with a deliberation to make himselfe king: and amongst his ordinarie discourses which he vsed to his friends, he said that it behoued him to take possession of the kingdom. To this intent hee prepared many chariots and horses, and fiftie men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of these his proceedings, reprooued him not, neither crossed this his deliberation; neither demaunded of him likewise, wherefore he presumed to attempt such vnseemly actions. Of this his reuolt hee had for his coadiutors Ioaab the Generall, and the high Priest Abiathar: but they that contradicted him, were the high Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Banaia the captaine of the guard, with Simei, Dauids friend: besides al other the valiant men at armes. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the Cittie, and in the suburbs neere vnto the fountaine of the Parke roiall, he inuited all his brethren vnto the same, except Salomon; and tooke with him Ioaab and Abiathar, with the gouernours of the tribe of Iuda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Banaia, and the rest of the contrary party, he called them not vnto the banquet. This did the prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabee, Salomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made king without the knowledge of Dauid, aduising her both to haue care of her owne securitie, and the estate and maiesty of her son (who by reason of Adonias vsurpation was like to be supplanted) wishing her in person to certifie the king thereof: and further promising, that while shee debated these things with the king, hee would come in in the meane while, and confirme that which shee had said. Bethsabee being thus perswaded by Nathan, came vnto the King, and humbling herselfe before him (and afterwards requiring licence to speake vnto him) shee certified him of all those things that had hapned, according as he had been aduised by the Prophet: particularly deciphering vnto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what guestes he had inuited (namely Abiathar and Ioaab, with the rest of his sonnes, except Salomon and his particular friends) vrging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should bee whom Dauid would nominate to succeed him: for which cause she earnestly besought Dauid, that he would prouide and foresee, that he who should succeed him in the gouernment, should neither seek her bloud, nor the death of her son Salomon. Whilst Bethsabee discoursed after this manner, the chamberlaines gaue the king to vnderstand that Nathan attended to speake with him. Whereupon, Dauid commaunded that hee should be called in, and as soone as he was entred, he asked the king if that day: he had appointed Adonias to gouerne & succeed in the kingdom after him? for that (said he) he hath made a sumptuous feast; whereunto he hath inuited all thy sonnes, but Salomon; thither also hath he called Ioaab: where, after the great cheer and banquetting, they haue proclaimed and cried, Long liue king Adonias. Furthermore (said hee) hee hath neither inuited mee, nor the high Priest Sadoc, nor the

A captaine of the guard Banaia. It therefore behooueth thee to let vs knowe, if this be done by thy approbation and allowance.

As soone as Nathan had made an end of his speech, Dauid commaunded that Bethsabee should be called in (who had retired herselfe out of the kings chamber, at such time as the Prophet entered into the same.) As soone as Bethsabee reentred the chamber, Dauid said vnto her, I sweare vnto thee by that great God, that thy sonne Salomon shall raigne after me, according as before this time I haue already sworne vnto thee, and he it is that shall sit vpon my throne, yea euen this present day. Vpon these words Bethsabee humbled herselfe, & besought God to grant the king long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc the high priest, and Banaia captaine of the guard, and gaue them in charge to take the Prophet Nathan with them; and all the men at armes that attended him in court; charging them to mount his sonne Salomon vpon the royall Moile, and to conduct him out of the Cittie neere vnto the fountaine of Gehon: in which place (after they had annointed him with holie oyle) hee willed them to proclaim Salomon king, commaunding the high Priest Sadoc, & the prophet Nathan to see his will performed; charging those that followed him thorow the Cittie, with sound of trumpet & a loud voice to cry out, that Salomon was seated for euer on his fathers throne, to the intent that all the people might vnderstand, that by his fathers consent he was declared king. But as touching Salomon, he gaue him instructions how he ought to behaue himselfe with pietie and iustice, in the gouernment of all the people of the Hebrewes, and of the tribe of Iuda. After this, Banaia besought God that it would please him to bee fauourable vnto Salomon, and with all expedition Salomon was mounted vpon the kings Mule, and conducted out of the Cittie neere vnto the fountaine; where (after he had been annointed with oyle) they brought him backe againe into the Cittie with ioy and applause, wishing him a long and prosperous gouernment: then reconducting him to the Kings palace, they placed him in his throne; and on the instant all the people beganne to celebrate banquets and feasts, and to disport and reioyce themselves with daunces and instruments of musicke: so that by reason of the multitude of instruments, both the earth and the ayre resounded therewith. So that Adonias & they that banquetted with him, hearing the noise, were all of them fore troubled; & Ioaab in particular said, that those tunes and trumpettings did no waies content him.

Whilst thus they sate at the banquet, & euerie man thorow amasse for bore to eate his meat (beeing distracted thorow varietie of thoughts) Ionathan the sonne of Abiathar came hastily in amongst them. This young man did Adonias most willingly behold, and said that he was a messenger of some glad tydings: but contrariwise hee recited vnto them all that which had befallen Salomon, or had been decreed by Dauid. Whereupon, Adonias and all his guestes forsooke the banquet, and suddainlie fledde euery man vnto his owne house. But Adonias fearing the Kings displeasure (by reason of his ambition and arrogancie) ranne vnto the Altar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a suppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reason had cause to doe.

Now when these tydings were brought vnto Salomon, and what he had done, and how hee required that Salomon would assure him, that hee would neuer more call to memory that which had happened, but pardon his offence: Salomon answered him graciously and moderately, and pardoned him that fault; notwithstanding with this caution, that if hereafter it should appeare that he intended or acted any rebellion, it should be Adonias himselfe, who should be the author of his mischief: with this answer he sent some to deliuer him from the Altar.

VVhen as therefore hee came into Salomons presence and had saluted him, he was commaunded to repaire home vnto his house, without suspect of any inconuenience: yet by the way was hee admonished to behaue himselfe vprightly for the time to come, if in any sort hee either respected his credit or profit.

But Dauid willing that his sonne should be accepted for their knowne and annointed King amongst the people, assembled the gouernours in Ierusalem, with the Priests and Leuites; and first of all taking the number of them, he found thirtie three thousand men that were aboue thirtie three yeeres old; 23000 of which, he appointed to take charge of the building of the temple, sixe thousand to be Iudges and Scribes, with the like number of Musicians to play vpon instruments, who were furnished by Dauid (as we haue heretofore declared) & distributed by him according to their families. So that separating the Priests from the rest of their tribe, he found foure & twentie families of them; sixteene of the house of Eleazar, and eight of the house of Ithamar; giuing order that one onely family should for the space of eight daies performe Gods seruice. And thus were all the families distributed by lotte in the presence of Dauid, of the high Priests Sadoc and Abiathar, and of all the Gouernours. The first family that attended the Temple was written first, the second next, and so successiully the rest, to the number of foure and twentie (and this law remaineth in the same sort euen vnto this day.) He made also twenty & foure diuisions of the tribe of Leui (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as did the priests, to euery eight day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posteritie: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasure, and of those presents which the kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Leuites as Priests) should serue God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole armie into twelue companies, with their Governours, Centurions and Conductors: euery Squadron contained foure and twentie thousand men, whom hee appointed to guard and attend king Salomon, for the space of thirtie daies (continuing from the first vntill the last, with their captaines ouer thousands, and centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authoritie ouer euery Squadron, whom he knew to be the most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surueyors, who should haue the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were vnnecessarie to declare.) After that euery one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Governours of the Hebrewes (and in generall, all those that had any commission ouer the affaires or demaines of the kings) to a generall assembly, and seating himselfe in a high erected throne, he spake after this manner. My brethren & countymen, I am desirous that you should know, that hauing determined with my selfe to build a temple vnto God, I haue made prouision of a great quantity of gold and siluer, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden mee to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my hand hath been soiled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne (who shall succeed me in my kingdom) shall erect a temple vnto him. Now therefore, sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelue sonnes of Jacob, Juda, by the generall consent of them all, obtained the principallitie; and that I amongst my sixe brethren haue bin preferred and placed by God in the kingdom, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himselfe to be injured: so do I also request that Salomon hauing obtained the Empire, my other sons, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselves nourish any vnaturall hatreds & seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly subiect themselves to his dominion. For whereas if God so please, it is not to be misliked to submit ourselues to forraigne subiection, how much more are ye bound to congratulate and fauour your brother no other wise, then if you were partakers of the same honours with him? Truly I desire nothing more then that Gods promises may be brought to effect, and that that felicity which attendeth this region (vnder the government of Salomon) may presently bee dispersed, and perpetually indure in this country. Which without doubt will so fall out, and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of pietie and iustice, and the ancient lawes and ordinances of thy progenitors: other wise, if thou be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortallitie and miserie. After he had finished these sayings, he gaue his sonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houses & chambers, together with the number, height & breadth of the same. Hee also limited the waight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of gold or of siluer, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the same. Hee encouraged likewise the Governours & the tribe of Leui to assist him, both for that his yeeres were not as yet obtained their ripe maturitie, as also for that by Gods diuine prouidence hee was admitted and elected king, and was appointed to build the temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no waies laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of siluer, and wood, besides a great multitude of carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantitie likewise of Emeraulds, & other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present, he would bestow on the temple, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out of his owne treasure to adorne the holie place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubims, that should stand vpon the Arke, and couer it with their wings.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Governours, Priests and Leuites according together, shewed a great readinesse, and made many signall and heroically offers. For they tied themselves to bring five thousand talents of gold and tenne thousand staters; of siluer a hundred thousand; and of iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious stone, hee brought it and deliuered it to the treasurers custody, who was called Talus, being one of Moses posteritie. This thing highly contented all the people, & David (seeing the affection & readinesse of the Governours and priests, and in generall of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator & father of this whole world, the fashioner both of diuine

A and humane things, and the President and Gouvernour of the Hebrewes, and their felicity and the kingdome by him committed vnto him. After this, he prayed for all the people that they might be bountiully blessed, and priuately he besought God to giue his sonne a good and iust mind, furnished and adorned with all vertue. He commanded the people likewise to sing praises vnto God: which they performed, and prostrated themselves vpon the earth, and afterwards gaue thanks vnto David, for all those benefites they had receiued during the time of his government. The next day, in way of sacrifice vnto God, they offered vp a thousand calves, a thousand rams, and a thousand lambs for sacrifice & a burnt offering: in way of peace offerings also, they slew many thousand other beasts. The king celebrated a feast all that day with the whole people, & Salomon was annointed with oyle the second time, & proclaimed king. Sadoe also was established high priest of all the people, & Salomon was conducted into the kings house, & placed in his fathers throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

The death of David, and how much he left his sonne towards the building of the temple.

Of long time after this, David fell sick thow age, and knowing that he should depart out of this world, he called for Salomon his sonne, and spake vnto him after this manner following; My sonne, I must now depart and sleepe with my fathers, & enter the common way, which both they that now liue, & those which come after shall tract; from whence we may not returne, neither behold and reuise those things that are done in this life. For Salomon, which I cause, whilst I yet liue and draw onward to my death, I earnestly exhort thee (as heerebefore I haue counselled thee) that thou behaue thy selfe iustly towards thy subiects, and devoutly towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdome; charging thee to keepe his precepts and lawes which he hath giuen vs, by Moses, and to take heed least either surpris'd by flatterie, or misled by fauour, or seduced by couetousnesse or any other sinister affection, thou bee drawne to neglect and forsake the same: for thou canst by no means continue in Gods fauour, except thou keepe his lawes, for other wise he will withdraw his prouidence from thee. But if in such sort as it becometh thee, and we with, thou behauest thy selfe towards him, thou shalt continue the kingdome in our familie; and no other house at any time but our owne, shall obtaine the dominion ouer the Hebrewes. Remember likewise the iniquitie of Isabell, who thow emulation slew two good and iust Generalls, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Israhel; punish him according as thou thinkest meete, for that hitherto hee hath escaped punishment, by reason hee was stronger and more powerful then my selfe. I commend also vnto thee the sonnes of Berzilai the Galaadite, whom for my sake aduance to honour, and adorne with dignities: not in bestowing any benefites on them, but in repaying those courtesies I haue receiued, which their father with a liberal hand bestowed vpon me during the time of my banishment, and for which hee made vs indebted to him. As touching Simei the sonne of Gera, of the tribe of Beniamin, who during the time of my flight, and at such time as I retired my selfe into my camp, injured me with great outrages, and afterwards came out to meete me neere vnto Iordan, & tooke assurance of mee, that for that time I should not punish him; at this present seeke you after him, and doe iustice vpon him.

After hee had thus exhorted his sonne, and had communicated with him all his affaires, both as touching his friends, as those also whom he thought worthy of punishment, hee gaue vp the ghost (after he had liued seauentie yeeres, and reigned in Hebron a Citie of Iuda for the space of seauen yeeres and a halfe, & thirtie three in Ierusalem ouer the whole nation.) Hee was a iust man, adorned with all vertue, requisite in a king that should haue the government of so many nations. For he was valiant beyond comparison, and in those battels which he fought for his subiects, hee was the first that thrust himselfe into danger, and exhorted his souldiers to behaue themselves valiantly, nor commanding them like their Gouvernour, but traualling and fighting with them as their fellow souldier. Hee was sufficient both in knowledge and foresight, both how to accept of the present, & how to manage his future occasions; hee was moderate and iust, courteous, and fauourable to those that were afflicted, and both iust & gentle, which are those ornaments wherewith Princes ought to be beautified: and in this great authoritie wherewith hee was placed, hee stopped not any waies awry, but in respect of Miriam his wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, then any other king of the Hebrewes, or other nations had done. His sonne Salomon buried him him most roially in Ierusalem, with all those ceremonies which were accustomed in roiall obsequies, and amongst other things, hee buried a great and huge value of riches with him: the incredible estimate whereof may be coniektured by that which followeth. For one thousand three hundred yeares after, the high Priest Hircanus being besieged by Antiochus surnamed the wicked (who was Demetrius son) and willing to gratifie him with some sum of money (to the intent hee might leuie the siege, and transport his armie some other waies) and vnable to leuie money by any other meanes, hee opened one Cabinet of the monuments of Dauid, from whence hee drew three thousand talents, which hee deliuered to Antiochus, and by this meanes deliuered the Citie from the siege (as we haue declared in another place.) And againe a long time after this, Herod also opened another Cabinet, from whence hee tooke out a great summe. And as touching the tombes of Princes; no man defaced them, because they were most magnificently builded, for the feare lest they should be esteemed destroyers of monuments. But for the present it sufficeth that I haue certified thus much.

How Salomon obtaining the kingdome, expelled his enemies.

The year of the world, 2931. before Christs Nativitie, 1033. 3. Reg. 2. Salomon king of Israel after Davids death.

I haue declared in the former Booke what Dauid was: how great his vertue hath beene, what profits and benefits those of his nation received by him, what warres and battels hee woorthily exploited, and how happily at last (through extreme old age) hee departed out of this life. But after that Salomon his sonne (being at that time very young) had obtained the kingdome, and was placed in his fathers throne (according as Dauid had determined, and the diuine power had decreed) the vvhole people (according to the common course in the election of new Princes) with their pious acclamations, wished him perpetuall felicitie in all his affaires, and after his well governed state and royaltie, long, many & prosperous yeares. But Adonias, who during his fathers life time thought

The year of the world, 2931. before Christs Nativitie, 1033.

A thought to possesse and seize himselfe of the roiall estate, came vnto the Kings mother, and with all humilitie & reuerence saluted her. To whom Bethsabe said, that if there were any thing wherein she mightsted him, hee should manifest it vnto her, and that shee would grant it him willingly. Whereupon hee began to say, that it was a thing very well knowne, that the kingdome appertained vnto him, both in regard of his age, as also in respect of the fauour & good liking of the people: but since that it had bene transferred vnto Salomon her sonne by the will of God, hee was content therewith, and would be his seruant, being very glad of the fortunate successe of his affaires. He therefore besought her that she would sollicite Salomon in his behalfe, & perswade him to giue him Abisace to wife, who had slept with Dauid, for that hee had not any carnall companie with her by reason of his age, and that as yet she was fully possessed of her virginie.

B Bethsabe promised him to further his sute to the utmost of her power, and willingly to employ herselfe toward the accomplishing of the mariage, both for that the king was willing to gratifie her in whatsoever she should desire, as also for that shee would instantly intreat him: so that he departed from her with assured hope of good successe in respect of his mariage. Heereupon presently did Bethsabe addresse herselfe to the king, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requested, and what she had granted. When tidings came to Salomon that his mother came to visite him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the roiall treasure was, hee sate him downe, and commaunded his seruants to place a seat on his right hand, for his mother, who settled by him, spake vnto him after this manner. My sonne, vouchsafe me one fauour that I shall request at thy hands, and send mee not hence discontented, and confuted thorow thy refusall. Salomon answered her, that she should command him, by reason that dutie tied him to the satisfaction and fauour of his mothers sutes, reproouing her for that insinuation she had vsed, by reason that thereby she evidently exprest that she was not thorowly assured to obtaine her demand; but that she feared the refusall & repulie in the same: she therefore required him to giue the Damzell Abisace for wife to Adonias his brother. The king displeased at this her sute dismissed his mother, allcading that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, & that hee wondred that in requiring Abisace to wife, hee had not requested Salomon likewise to giue him place in the kingdome: for Adonias was elder then he, & had more mightie friends then hee had; namely, the Generall Ioab, and the high Priest Abiathar. For which cause hee incontinently sent Banaia captaine of his guard to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling vnto him the high Priest Abiathar: The paines (said he) that thou hast indured by accompanying my father Dauid, and attending & bearing the Arke with him, make thee escape from death: yet notwithstanding, for that thou hast bin an assisstant to Adonias, & followed his faction, I condemne thee to depart from my presence, charging thee not to see my face any more, but to retire thy selfe to thine owne house, & there to liue in thy country vntill thou hast ended thy daies: for hauing in this sort neglected me, it is not conuenient that thou shouldest be in honour with me. For this cause was the house of Ithamar depriued of the priestly dignitie (according as God had foreprophecied to Eli, one of the ancestors of Abiathar) & translated to the race of Phinees, and established in Sadoc. Those of the race of Phinees, who led a priuate life all that time that the Priesthood remained in the familie of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the first) were these: Pocci the sonne of Ioseph, Ioab the sonne of Bocci, Marath the sonne of Ioab, Aropha the sonne of Marath, Achitob the sonne of Aropha, Sadoc the son of Achitob, who was the first high Priest vnder king Dauid.

Adonias is slaine. Abiathar is dispossessed of the priesthood

The genealogie of the high Priest Sadoc.

Ioab hauing tidings of the death of Adonias, was seized with suddaine and extreme feare: for hee loued him more then king Salomon, and by reason of that friendship, which hee bare vnto him, hee iustly and vpon good grounds apprehended his owne danger, and in this respect hee fled vnto the Altar, hoping in that place to be secured in regard of that reuerence which the king bare vnto God. But when Ioabs resolution was made knowne vnto the king, hee sent Banaia vnto him with commission to bring him from the Altar, & to conduct him to the iudgement seat, that hee might in that place iustifie his actions: But Ioab said that hee would neuer abandon the Temple, but that hee had rather die in that place then in another. Where Banaia had certified the king of this his answer, hee commaunded him to cut off his head in the same place, according as hee required, and that in that sort hee should be punished by reason of the two murders, which hee had committed vpon the persons of Abner and Ismael: commanding that his bodie should be buried in the same place, to the end that his sinnes should neuer depart from his race, and that both Dauid and Salomon might be held guiltlesse of the death of Ioab. This command of his Banaia executed, and was afterward made generall of all the men of varre. Moreover, the king esta-

Hee commanded Semei also to build him a house in Ierusalē, & to keep himselfe therein, without passing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to breake that commandement, the penaltie which he should incurre, should be no lesse then death; and to the more serious performance of this his iniunction, he tied him by a solemn oath. Semei thanked Salomon for the charge he had imposed on him, and swore that he would fulfill the same: so that forsaking his owne country, he came & dwelt in Ierusalem, where after he had sojourned for the space of three yeeres, it hapned that hee had newes that two of his fugitiue slaues had fled, & retired themselues into Geth: whereupon he went to find them out, & no sooner returned he backe againe with them, but that the king had intelligence that he had neglected his commandement; and that which is more, that hee had broken that oath which hee made vnto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cause calling him vnto him, he spake after this manner; Hast thou not sworne (said he) that thou wilt no waies abandon or issue out of this Citie to depart into another? Truly thou shalt not escape the penaltie of thy periuirge, but I will see iustice done vpon thee for the same, and for those outrages thou didst offer vnto my father during his sight, at which time thou didst shew thy selfe to be a wicked man in all things: to the end that thou maist vnderstand that the wicked receiue no priuiledge, although that their punishment be for the present deferred, but at such time as they suppose theselues to be assured (because they haue suffered no punishment) their punishment is augmented and made more grievous, then it had been if they had presently been executed for their offences. Whereupon Banaia slew Semei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward Salomon had his royall estate secured, and after that his enemies had receiued condigne punishment, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Pharao king of Egypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Ierusalem, farre greater & more stronger then they were before: and all the rest of his life, he gouerned his Common-weale in peace, of lawes, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the houre of his death: but behauing himselfe in all things exactly, he executed the affaires of his kingdom with that circumspection, that such as excelled him in yeeres, and were aduanced in prudence, could not surpasse him.

CHAP. II.

Of the wisdom, prudence, and riches of Salomon, and how first of all he builded the Temple in Ierusalem.

AS soone as he came to Hebron, hee determined to pay his vowes vnto God, on that brazen altar which was erected by Moses, and sacrificed thereon in burnt offerings a thousand head of cattell; which honourable deuotion of his was most acceptable vnto God. For the very same night, after he had appeared vnto him in a dreame, hee commaunded him to aske whatsoever blessing (as he imagined) sufficient to recompence this his pietie. But Salomon required a most high & excellent thing, which God doth most liberally bestow, and men in like sort very happily receiue. For hee demaunded neither gold nor siluer, nor any other kind of riches (such as a youthly man would require) for these are onely affected by the common sort, when the other are onely worthy of the diuine magnificence: But giue me (said he) O Lord, a ripe iudgement, and a good vnderstanding, to the intent that by these meanes, I may administer iustice to this people with truth and equitie. With this demaund of his God was greatly delighted, and promised him to giue him all other things whereof hee had made no mention, namely, riches and glory; and about all these, such an vnderstanding & wisdom, as no one man either king or priuate hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the kingdom in his family for many ages, if so be that he continued in the waies of iustice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers waies imitating his chiefe virtues.

After that Salomon had receiued these blessings from God, & was made happy by these promises, hee forooke his bed, and worshipping God returned vnto Ierusalem, where hee offered great sacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnificently feasted all those of his household. About the same time a verie difficult iudgement was brought him to decide, the resolution whereof, was very hard to be discouered. And I haue thought it necessarie to declare the occasions whereon at that present the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may vnderstand the difficultie of the cause in question, and that if they happen at any time to be assistant in such like affaires, they might draw as it were from the counterfeite of this Kings wisdom, a perfect

A module wherby they may directly shape an answer to such demaunds as shall bee offered them.

Two women of loose and lustfull conuersation came vnto him, one of which (who seemed to haue suffered the iniurie) began after this manner: I, O King (said she) and this woman dwell together in one chamber; but so it fortuneth, that both of vs on one day, and at the same houre, bare each of vs a sonne: some three daies after we were brought a-bed, this woman lying by her infant, hath in sleepe overlaid it, and stifled it, and hath taken my childe from betwene my knees & laid it by her, and settled the dead childe whilest I slept, in my bosome. Now on the morrow when I thought to offer the teate vnto mine infant, I found not mine owne, but perceived that her childe lay dead by me: for I knew it, because I had exactly marked it. This my child I haue redeemed at her hands, and because I could not recouer it, I haue made my recouir vnto your Maie-ties iustice, O king: for in that we were sole women, and she is obstinate and feareth not to be conuicted by any, she persisteth in her obstinate deniall of the same. After the king had heard this her demaund, he inquired of the other if she had any thing to answer vnto this accusation. But she denying the act, and auerring that the childe which remained aliue, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and besides that, since no man appeared that might determine the controuersie, but all the assistants were amazed at the obscuritie and difficultie of the debate, the king at last bethought him of this policie. He commaunded that both the children should be brought before his presence as well the liuing as the dead; and calling one of his guard vnto him, he commanded him with his naked sword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the halfe of the liuing, & the other halfe of the dead childe.

This sentence of his was secretly condemned by all the people, accounting it verie childlike. In the meane time the true mother began to exclaime, and desire that the matter might not passe so far; but rather that they should giue the whole childe that was aliue, vnto the other: for that it sufficed her, so as she might see him aliue, that he might be supposed to be an others. The aduerser part offered her selfe to behold the diuision of the infant: and moreover required that the true mother should bee punished. But the king coniecturing by the discourse, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was most vnained; adiudged the infant vnto her that cried first, (for that in equitie she was the true mother) and condemned the wickednesse of the other, who had murdered her owne childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people tooke this iudgement for an assured prooff and signe of the kings prudence and wisdom; and from that time forwardes they respected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a diuine spirit. The chieftaines and gouernours vnder him thorow all the kingdome were these: Vri gouerned the countrey of Ephraim, wherein the sea coast, and had espoused the daughter of Salomon. The great Plaine was subiect to Banaia the sonne of Achila, who gouerned likewise all the countrey that extended towards Iordan. Gad commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulques, as farre as the mountaine Libanus, and had vnder him sixtie great Cities, and fortis; Achinadab gouerned all Galilee as farre as Sidon, and had espoused also one of Salomons daughters called Basima: Banaia had the countrey that confineth the sea nere to the Citie of Arce; Saphar, the mountanes Itabyr, and Carmel; and the land of Galilee as farre as Iordan: Sabeia gouerned the whole land of the Beniamites: Tabar had all the government on the other side of Iordan, and was elected gouernour generall ouer them all.

Thus about this time did the Hebrewes wonderfully increase in riches, and the tribe of Iuda waxed opulent, by reason that the people addicted themselues wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was vnder such assurance, that being distracted by no warlike tumults, and besides that fruitfully enioying a most desired libertie, they especially intended this thing onely, to encrease their priuate and particular estates. The king also had other gouernours who ruled the Syrians; and commaunded other strange nations, which are extended from Euphrates as farre as Egypt, who gathered the tribute of those nations for the king. These Barbarians euerie day furnished the king for his owne Table, and the maintenance of his household, with thirtie Cores of fine flour, and sixtie of the courser: ten fat Oxen, and twentie grasse beeces, with a hundred fat lambes. All which things, besides venison and bassalles taken in chase, birds, and fish, were furnished daily by the Barbarians to serue the kings household. He had likewise a great number of chariots; so that he had fortie thousand maners wherein his coach horses fed; and besides these he had twelue thousand horsemen, halfe whereof kept alwayes about the king in Ierusalem, the rest were billeted in diuers villages belonging to the king, and remained there.

And they that had the charge to furnish the kings expences, provided likewise necessarie prouender

der for the horses, conueying it to that place whereouer the king sojourned. But so great was the wisdom and prudence which God had bestowed vpon Salomon, that hee surpassed all his progenitors: and the Egyptians likewise, who are esteemed the wisest of all men, were farre behind him in wit. For he excelled all those that in that time were in the greatest account amongst the Hebrewes, whose names I will not omit; & these they were, Ethan, Eman, Eman, Chalt and Dadan the sonne of Immon. He composed also a thousand and five hundred bookes of odes and canticles, and thirtie thousand bookes of Parables and Similitudes; for to euery kind of plant he alluded his parable from hyssope, vnto the Cedar. The like did he of all liuing creatures that feed on the earth, swimme in the waters, or flie in the ayre; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to search their faculties in particular; but examined & discoursed on them all, and had an inward speculation and knowledge of their seuerall and secreete properties. He obtained also by inspiration the Art of Magicke, for the profit and health of men, and the exorcising and casting out of diuels: for he deuised certain incantations, whereby the diseased are cured, and left the methode of coniuuration in writing, whereby the diuels are enchanted and expelled; so that neuer more they dare returne: And this kind of healing to this day, is very visuell amongst those of our nation. For I saw a certaine popular and priuate man amongst the Hebrewes, in the presence of Vespasian; his sonnes, tribunes, and other souldiers, that cured diuers that were possessed. And the manner of his cure was this: He applied to the nose of the Demoniack a Ring; vnder the seale whereof, was a roote of those things that Salomon had declared, which drew the diuell out of the nostrils of the sicke, as soone as hee smelled the roote: and as soone as the man was fallen, hee adured him neuer more to returne, intermixing some mention of Salomon, and rehearsing those incantations that were inuented by him.

After this, the said Elezar being desirous to shewe vnto them that were present, the efficacy of his Arte, he set a pot or pitcher of water not farre from the place which the possessed stood, and commanded the diuell at such times as he forooke the man to ouerturne the pot, and thereby to giue a signe vnto the assistants, that he had forsaken the possessed: which act of his manifestly declared how great the science and wisdom of Salomon was. For which cause I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy nature of this king might be knowne vnto all men, and how beloued he was of God, and how surpassing in all kindes of vertue. When Hiram, king of Tyre vnderstood that Salomon succeeded his father in the kingdom, he was glad thereof (for he was Dauid's friend) for which cause he sent messengers vnto him to salute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him; by whom Salomon returned an answer in these termes. Salomon to Hiram the king: Know thou, that my father hauing a will to build a Temple vnto God, hath been withdrawn from the performance thereof, by the continuall warres and troubles he hath had: for he neuer tooke rest before he either had defeated his enemies, or made the tributaries vnto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I possesse, & for that by the means thereof, I haue opportunitie (according to mine own desire) to build a temple vnto God: for he it is that foretold my father that this house should be builded during my raign. For which cause I pray you send some one of your skilfullest men with my seruants to the wood Libanus, to hew downe trees in that place: for the Sidonians are more skilfull in the hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleauers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this letter, he was verie glad to peruse the contents of the same, and wrote backe againe vnto him to this effect.

The king Hiram vnto king Salomon: Thou hast cause to thank God, in that he hath deliuered thy fathers kingdom into thy handes, to thee I say, who art a man wise and full of vertue. For which cause since no newes can come vnto me more gracious, nor office of loue more esteemed then this, I will accomplish all that thou requestest: for after I haue caused a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut downe, I will send it thee by sea by my seruants, whom I will command (and furnish with convenient vessels of burthen) to the end they may deliuer the same, in what place of thy kingdom it shall best please thee; that afterwards thy subiects may transport them to Ierusalem. You shall provide to furnish vs with corne, whereof wee stand in need, because we inhabit an Island.

The copies are yet at this day kept, not onely by those of that nation, but also by the Tyrians: so that if any man desire exactly to know what they be, let him search the publique records of the Tyrians, and he shall find in them matters accordant to that wee haue said. All which I say, to this end that the readers might be assured, that I outstrip not the truth in any sort, and that I trust not in this historie matters that are merely apparant & deceitfull, & onely fashioned for delight; neither feare I that any man shall examine my writings; neither desire I likewise that euery man giue credite at the first sight to the same, or that I be held blamelesse in suffering my selfe any waies to vary or improperly dilate ought in this historie: but contrariwise, if I cannot approoue the truth by demonstration, and sufficient testimonies, I desire not to be allowed. As soone as Salomon had receiued these letters from the king of the Tyrians, he praised his facilitie and beneuolence, and presently sent him that which he demanded: euerie year therefore he sent him two thousand Cores of wheat, and the like number of Bads of oyle (this Bad containeth seuentie and two sextaries.) He gaue him also the like measure of wine. From that time forward the friendship betwixt Hiram and Salomon increased more and more, so that both of them protested that it should continue for euer. Theking imposed on his people the tribute of thirtie thousand workemen, whom he gaue in charge to trauell continually, and distributed them verie discretely. Hee ordained that ten thousand of them should cut wood in Libanus for the space of one moneth; and that then they should rest two moneths, returning euerie man vnto his owne dwelling place: vntill such time as the twentie thousand had in their turne accomplished the taske in the time that was prefixed vnto them, and then the first 10000. renewed their work, & followed the same in the fourth month. Ador was constituted superintendēt ouer this tribute. Besides these, there were 70000. men appointed to carie stones & wood, who were the inhabitants of that country, which Dauid had left. There were foure score thousand hewers of stone, ouer which were 3200. comissaries: these had the king commaunded to cut the greatest stones, to make the foundations of the temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountaine, he commaunded should be drawne and brought into the Citie, and not onely commaunded he his countymen to performe this, but those workemen also that were sent him by Hiram.

Salomon began this building in the fourth year of his raigne, in the second month which the Macedonians call Artemisium, and the Hebrewes Iar; five hundredth nintie and two yeares after the departure of the Israelites out of Aegypt; one thousand and twentie yeeres, since the arriual of Abraham in Mesopotamia; one thousand foure hundred and fortie yeares after the Deluge: And since Adam the first man vntill Salomon (who builded the Temple) all the yeares that are passed, haue bene three thousand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleuenth yeare of the raigne of Hiram, who gouerned in Tyre: and since the first time that Tyre began to be inhabited, vntill the said building of the Temple, there passed two hundred and fortie yeares. The king therefore laid the foundations of the Temple, and made a most deep trench, & fortified it with most strong stones, which might be able to resist all the iniuries of time. These stones were so closely ioined the one vnto the other, that for the strenght of the foundations, they might serue to make the base and ground, both to fortifie the worke, as also to sustaine that which should be builded thereupon, either for embellishment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of lesse strength and hugeness, which were to sustaine a sumptuous pile of that height, greatnes, magnificence and ornament. The walles were made of white stone, and continued of the same matter euen vntill the rooffe. The height of the Temple was sixtie cubits, and the length as much, and the bredth twentie.ouer that was another edifice, hauing the like dimensions; so that the whole height of the Temple was sixscore cubits: and the entrie therof was to the East-ward. The porch that gaue entry therinto, had twentie cubits in length (which was the bredth of the Temple) and in bredth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of sixscore cubits. About the Temple were builded thirtie celles, which inuironed the circuit of the same on the outside, and serued to sustaine all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and passable the one into the other. The entries were made after the same manner, from whence a man might easily passe from the one to the other. Euerie one of these Celles had twentie and five cubits in bredth, and as many in length, and twentie in height: and about the there were other builded: & others likewise about these of like number, & dimension: so that they were almost as high as the other buildings.ouer these there were no buildings; only this, they were covered with Cedar: Euery Cel had his couer apart, & had no dependence on the other roofes. The rest of the building of the temple was covered with long beames, mortized the one within the other, which sustained the whole: so that the wals being in this manner fastned the one vnto the other, were the more stronger. To these beames were there fastned certaine roofes of the same stuffe, which were curiously polished, carued and gilded. The walles on the inside were covered with Cedar planks intermixed with gold: so that all the Temple shined, and the burnisht gold lightned, and dazled their eies that entred into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was most artificially made of stones most exactly carued, and most closely and cunningly ioined together: so that they that curiously pried into the same, could not any waies

As touching the ascent into the higher part of the Temple, the king in that fort deuised it, that in the thicknesse of the wall hee included a paire of winding staires to that purpose. This part had not a great gate towards the Eastward, as the lower had, but in the sides there were little doors made: All the whole temple both within & without was couered with Cedar planks, tied together with strong chains to fortifie and strengthen the same. The Temple inwardly was diuided into two parts, the one whereof contained the sanctum sanctorum, of twenty cubits (which was vnaccessible) the rest of the space, of fortie cubits was consecrated to the vse of the Priests. And in the midst of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, enriched with store of gold, & diuers curious carued works, & hung them with tapistrie: wherein were embroidered diuers flowers of hyacinth, purple, & scarlet intermingled with most pure, white & delicate linnen. He placed also vpon the holy of holiest (which was 20. cubits broad, & as many long) 2. Cherubims of masse gold, each one 5. cubits hie, & each of the had two wings that were spread 5. cubits broad, by which means they were not far distant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the southern wall of the sacred place, & the other the northern wall: the other wings that touched one another, serued for a couer for the Ark which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impossible to expresse: he made the pauement of the Temple also, of plates of beaten gold. To the gate of the Temple also he fastned convenient doores 20. cubits high, answearable in height to the wall, & couered with plates of gold. In a word, he left nor one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garnished with gold: he likewise adorned the outside of the gates as he had done the inside. But the gate of the porch had no such ornament. After this, Salomon sent vnto Hiram king of Tyre for one, who was a cunning workman called Vram, the sonne of a woman of the line of Nephthali; and of Vram the Israelite. This man had great knowledge in all kind of works, but his especiall excellencie was in working gold, siluer and brasse, who made all that which concerned the Temple, according as the king commaunded. He made two pillars of brasse, foure fingers thicke, and eightene cubits high, and twelue in the circumference; on the chapters of each of them, hee planted a founded lilly, of five cubits in height, which he enuironed with certaine grates made of brasse after the manner of enterlaced nets, which couered the lillies on each side, on which there hung downe two hundred Pomgranates in two ranks. These pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Iachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded also the brazen Sea made after the manner of a Hemisphaere, & this vessel was called the sea, by reason of the hugeness thereof. For it was a lauer that by measured line was ten cubits broad, the thicknes of a hand; the midst therof was sustained with a pillar ten times twisted, whose bignes was a cubite. This lauer was sustained by twelue heifers, which by three & three were placed directly opposite against the quarters of the foure winds; and the hindermost part of these heifers were set some what stooping, to the end that this round and ample vessell might bee the more surely supported by them. This sea contained three thousand Bads. He made also ten brazen bases foure square, for the lau-ers, each one in length five cubits, in breadth foure, in height three; thus were the parts of this worke severally fashioned. There were foure little pillars square, and erected at euerie corner one, in which the sides of the bases were adioined, and diuided into three sorts, according to the place distinguished between the ioynts, with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in an other place an Eagle. The pillars likewise were adorned with the same engraving; and all this whole worke hung vpon foure wheelles, which were made of cast worke, which had certaine naues or spokes a cubite and a halfe in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to see the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly fetled to the sides of the bases by their naues, or strakes. They were thus made: the corners or angles on the vpper part were sustained by certaine shoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which was there placed a spire, to which the lauer was fastned, being upheld by the pawes of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were fashioned & so properly vnited, that they that beheld them would haue supposed them rather to be naturall creatures then otherwise: and betwixt them also there were certaine palme trees figured: Such was the composition of the ten lau-ers. Moreover, he made ten other brazen lau-ers after the manner of a round cockle shell, each of which contained fortie Choes: for they were in height foure cubites, and from brim to brim, there were likewise foure cubites: which lau-ers hee placed vpon ten bases or feete called Mechonoth, five of which stode on the left side of the Temple, that extended to the northward, the other five on the right hand toward the southward; yet so as they affronted the East. Here likewise placed he the sea full of water, to the intent that the

A priests entring into the temple, might wash their hands and feete before they went vnto the altar. The other lau-ers serued to wash the inwards and feete of those beasts that were sacrificed. He builded likewise a brazen Altar of twenty cubites long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewise all the vessels that belonged thereunto of brasse: as kettels, water pots, hookes and forks, and such like, that in brightnesse equalled the pure gold. The king also dedicated many tables, and amongst theie, one great one of golde (on which the sacred bread was laide) the rest not farre inferiour, yet made after diuers manners, held cwers and platters of gold, to the number of twenty thousand, and of siluer fortie thousand. He made likewise ten thousand candlestickes (according as Moses had commaunded) whereof one he dedicated in the temple, that according to the law it might giue light there in the day time. Hee made a table also, on which the loaves of bread were laid, on the north side of the temple hard by the candlestick, which was placed towards the South-ward. The altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were inclosed in that part of the temple that contained fortie cubits, before the tapistry of the holy of holiest, where the Arke should be placed. The king also caused fourescore thousand pots, and a hundred thousand ewers of gold, and twice as many of siluer, to be made; and fourescore thousand plates of gold, and twice so many of siluer, to offer the kneaded flower in them vpon the altar; and threecore thousand cups of gold, & twice so many of siluer, to lay the flower mingled with oyle thereon; and two thousand measures of gold, and twenty thousand of siluer, resembling a Hin or an Epha of Moses. Twenty thousand of Censors also of gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the temple; & other censors likewise in which they carried fire from the great altar, and laid it on the lesser which was within the temple, to the number of fiftie thousand. Hee prepared also a thousand vestments for the vse of the priests, with their surcoats, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithstanding there was but one crowne wherein Moses had written the name of God, which hath continued euen vntill this day. He made also ten thousand stoales for the priests of fine linnen, with scarlet girdles, for euery one of them; two hundred thousand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moses, and fortie thousand instruments of musicke to record & praise God with (as the Plalterie and harpe of a mixt matter, the fift part gold, and the fourth part siluer.) All which Salomon most magnificently prepared for the seruice of God, sparing no cost, but employing himselfe to the vttermost of his power, toward the ornament of the temple; which he beautified, & endowed with all these treasures. He enuironed the temple likewise with a certaine wall some three cubits hie, which in our tongue we call Gison, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the priests only. Without this wall there stood a temple fouresquare with great & broad Iles, which opened with very great gates, euery one according to the quarter of the winde; and the doores thereof were couered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewise that kept the ordinances of Moses. It may not be spoken or scarcely beleueed, although it were scene, how admirable that exteriour temple was: for hee filled huge trenches, which by reason of their immeasurable depth, could not be looked downe into without vehement apprehension of feare (for they were foure hundred cubits deepe) yet notwithstanding he filled them, and raised them to the height of the hill, whereon the temple was built; & by this meanes it came to passe, that the walk without the temple, was equalled with the foundation of the same. This did he begirt with double porches, sustained by pillars of rich stone; the rooffe whereof were of polished Cedar, and the gates were of Masseue siluer.

After that king Salomon had in seven yeeres finished these so huge, faire, and magnificent build-ings, and all the other necessities which hee had bestowed vpon the temple, and declared thereof by his great riches, and confirmed his readines to be such, that that which at the first sight might require a mans whole life to finish, hee accomplished in few yeeres, in respect of the greatneesse of the temple: Hee wrote vnto the gouernours and elders of the Hebrewes, commanding them to assemble all the people in Ierusalem to behold the temple, & to bring in the Arke of God: and although this assembly was publicly proclaimed, yet scarcely did the people make their appearance in Ierusalem before the seventh moneth, which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feast of Tabernacles, which the Hebrewes most religiously obserue and honour with great festiuals. They therefore tooke the Arke and Tabernacle that Moses had before time made, with all those necessities which appertained to the diuine seruice, and bare them into the temple. The king and all the people with the Leuites marched before, hauing their cattell ready to sacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of diuers slaughtered beasts, burning an infinit quantitie of perfumes, wherewith the ayre was filled round about; men, and runnagates in a forraine land. And as concerning the Temple which is builded at this present, I will (said he) deliuer it to the enemies to ransacke and burne it, and the Cittie shall bee destroyed by the hands of the enemies: & their miseries shall bee so notorious thorow the world, and to such extremitie shal they be driuen, as it shall hardly bee belieued: so as their neighbours round about them, hearing tidings of their calamities shall bee astonished, and shall seeke out the cause why the Hebrewes are thus hated by GOD, who before times haue been so aduanced by him in riches and honours: and they shall vnderstand thereof by those that suruiue, in hearing them confesse their sinnes; and the transgressions they haue committed against the ordinance of their forefathers. These things that were declared vnto him in a dreame, are registred in the sacred letters.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Salomons palace finished in thirteene yeeres.

Seauen yeares after the Temple had bene thus builded (as it hath bene heeretofore declared) hee beganne the building of his Palace, which he scarcely finished in thirteene yeeres space (for he was not so intent and earnest in building thereof, as he was in the structure of the Temple.) For although the temple were very great, and of incredible and maruailous magnificence, yet so it is, that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workmen, it was thorowly finished within the terme of the yeeres aforesaid. But the roiall Palaces, being farre lesser then was the temple, were builded more slowly, because the stufte had not bene prepared so long time before, neither with so great affection; and the rather, because the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Norwithstanding, this house was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the country and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it shall not be amisse if I declare all the order & disposition of the same house, that by the description thereof the Reader may both gather and consider the whole amplitude thereof: It was a great & goodly lodging, sustained by diuers pillars, prepared to receiue and containe much people at the time of their assemblies, wherein they intreated of affaires and held pleas. It was a hundred cubites in length, and in breadth fiftie, and in height thirtie, comprised vnder sixteene square pillars couered with Corinthian worke, with staires of the like measure, and carued gates, both pleasant for sight, and fit for fortification.

The hall. The tribunall.

In the midst of this space, and hard by the temple, there was another square Pavillion thirtie cubits large, sustained with strong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunall, on which the King sate to giue iudgement: vnto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queene. All the chambers, as well those that were ordinarily in vse, as those for recreation after he had retired himselfe from publique affaires, were adorned with planks of carued Cedar, and were builded partly of stone ten cubits square, partly of curious marble, and very rarely & cunningly wrought (such as are wont to adorn temples and palaces) and are found out by the most curious & cunning Masons. And that which made it more beautiful, were 3 panes of tapistrie, & the fourth admirable for the artificiall engrauiings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of diuers sorts, shadowed with their branches & leaues, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would haue thought that they shooke, the workmanship was so exquisite & curious that couered the stone. The rest, as far as the rooffe, was enchaced, & flourished with diuers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleasure, with very long porches to beautifie the palace; amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make banquettes and feasts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the necessities belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of those that banquetted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugeness and varietie of these roiall lodgings, both greater and lesser; of those that were hidden vnder the earth, as of those, which being lifted vp in the aire, did manifestly manifest their beautie: The pleasant arbors likewise delightfull to behold, & most contenting in summer, for that they were couered and warranted from the heat. To speake in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of gold, and of siluer: the floores and walls were figured with diuersitie of flowers and of precious stones, inchaced in gold, after the manner of the temple of God, which shined with such like ornaments. There was likewise erected a most mightie throne, made in forme of a tribunall, with six steps of pure Iuorie: on each side of which there stood two ramping Lions, and the like number were placed aboue. The stage of the throne was after the forme of hands, that laid hold on the King: and hee sate vpon a halfe Oxe looking backwards: and this throne was all inuironed with gold.

3. Reg. 10.

Salomons throne made of Iuory. 3. Reg. 5.

Salomon builded all this that hath bene spoken of, in the space of twentie yeeres, being furnished by Hiram king of the Tyrians for these his buildings, with great summes of gold, and far more greater of siluer, besides a quantitie of Cedar and Pine trees: Salomon also remunerated him,

A him, and gaue him great presents, and sent him euerie yeare sufficient of corne, wine and oyle (as we haue heretofore declared) whereof he stood in great neede, by reason that his Country was an Island. And besides that, he gaue him twentie Cities in Galilee, not farre distant from Tyre. Hiram hauig visited them, and nor wel pleased with them, sent vnto Salomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no vse for his cities: and from that time forward they were called the countrey of Chebal, which is as much to say in the Phoenician tongue, as vnpleasant. Hiram likewise sent vnto Salomon certaine mysteries and difficult questions, requiring him to decide the same, and to dissolue those doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Salomon being a man of ripe iudgement and vnderstanding, pretermitted none of them; but after he had attained their resolution in his owne opinion, and had gathered the sense, he expressed and opened the same. Of these two kings, Menander (who translated the antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phoenician tongue into the Greeke) maketh mention, speaking after this manner. After the decease of Abibale, Hiram his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome, who liued fiftie and three yeeres, and reigned thirtie and foure. He annexed the field which is called Ample, vnto the Island, and dedicated a golden pillar in Iupiters Temple. He also caused a great quantitie of wood to bee hewed downe in the mountaine Libanus, to make couers and roofes for Temples. For hauing pulled down some ancient temples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Astrate, and made this first building of Hercules in the moneth Peritien, and made warre against the Eueceans, who refused to pay their tributes: and after he had once againe brought them vnder his subiection, hee returned to his owne palace. In his time liued the young sonne of Abdimon, who alwaies resolued those questions which Salomon king of Ierusalem proposed. Dins also maketh mention of him in these termes. After the decease of Abibale, his sonne Hiram reigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the Cittie to the Eastward, and enlarged the same, and conioyned the Temple of Olympian Iupiter to the Cittie, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place betweene them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of gold: and afterwarde going vp to Libanus, he hewed downe timber to build temples withall. He said also, that Salomon reigning at that time in Ierusalem, sent vnto Hiram certaine subtrill questions, demanding the exposition thereof vnder this condition, that if he declared them not, in way of penaltie hee should pay a great summe of money; and afterwarde that a certain Tyrian called Abdimon, expounded that which had bene proposed: and in lieu thereof proposed certaine others, which Salomon could not expound, and for that occasion he paid a great summe of money vnto Hiram. This is it that Dins writeth.

Dins of Salomon.

The king seeing that the Cittie wanted both bulwarks and towers to secure the same, and that the strength of the same was no way answerable to the dignitie thereof, hee repaired the walles, and erected great towers on the same. Moreover he builded certaine Cities, which deserue to be memorized among the most renowned, namely, Afor and Magedon, & for the third, the cittie of Gaza in the country of the Philistines: against which Pharaos king of Egypt led out his army, and rooke it by force, and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof to the sword, he destroyed the same, and afterwards he gaue it in dower vnto his daughter, which married with Salomon. For which cause the king fortified it, seeing it to be already sufficiently defended by nature, and that it stood verie commodiously for the warre, and to hinder the inuasions of the enemy that might happen. Not farre from thence he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Berachor, and the other Balerh. Besides these he builded others, which were Cities of recreation and pleasure, by reason of the good temperature of the aire, and the pleasantnesse of the fruits, and in especially the sweet streamy riuers, wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the desert that is about Syria, & coquering the same, he builded an other great city two daies iourney distant from the higher Syria, a daies iourney from Euphrates, and fixe from the great Babylon. The cause why this Cittie was inhabited farre from the ciuill and peopled quarters of Syria, was, because in no place of the lower countrey there was water to be found, & in this Cittie only there were fountaines and springs. He therefore builded this Cittie, and begirt it with strong walles, and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians tearme it by, even at this day: and amongst the Greekes it is called Palmyra.) And these were Salomons works in that time. But for that there are diuerse that demand the question how it cometh to passe, that all the Kings of Egypt that haue bene since Minzus the founder of Memphis, and who reigned diuerse yeeres before our great ancestor Abraham, who (I say) haue bene till Salomons time, for the space of more then thirtene hundred yeeres, haue bene called Pharaos; deriuuing that name from one that reigned in the mid time betweene both: I haue thought it requisite to manifest the same to the

the intent to resolve that doubt and expresse the cause of that name. The name of Pharao amongst the Egyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I thinke that from their childhood they had other distinct names; and that afterwards when they are created kings, they take vpon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no lesse, then Authoritie. For the kings of Alexandria hauing been before time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the kingdom, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first king. The Romane Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they haue other names at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæsars; because the soueraigntie and honour whereunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was giuen them by their fathers is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I thinke) that although Herodotus of Halicarnassus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there haue beene three hundred and thirtie kings of Egypt; yet declareth hee not their names, because they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a woman had obtained the kingdom, he called her by her owne proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who haue beene kings, were vsually called by this name, and that it had not beene communicated vnto this woman: for which cause it was necessarie to declare her owne first name. For mine owne part, I haue found in the bookes of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father in law to Salomon, no one of the kings of Egypt haue beene called by that name: and that somelittle while after, the aforementioned woman came vnto Salomon, who reigned in Egypt and Aethiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I haue made mention of it, to make it knowne that our records and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, accord in many things.

But king Salomon conquered the Chananites (which till that time were nor vnder his subiection) and those that inhabited the mountaine Libanus, as farre as the Citie of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them euery yeare such, as he might employ in seruile actions, and in domestick businesse, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slaue: neither was it conuenient, that since God had subiected diuers nations vnder them (whom they might make slaues of) that they should tie those of their owne nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in armes, and rather tooke delight to mount Chariots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaues.ouer the Chananites (whom he employed in his seruice) hee appointed fise hundred and fiftie commissaries, who had their charge and authoritie from the king, & tasked them to those works and handie labours wherin they employed them. He builded a nauy also in the gulf of Aegypt, in a certaine place of the red sea called Afiongaber, which is named Berenice, not farre from the Citie of Elana (which countrey in times past appertained to the Iewes.) And toward the building of this nauie, he obtained of Hiram king of Tyre, a verie conuenient furtherance: for he sent him modules of ships, and men that were skilfull in nauigation, whom he charged to faile with his procurers and factors, to the countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this present the land of Golde, in the countrey of India, to bring golde from thence: who returned backe againe vnto the King, after they had gathered about foure hundred talents.

About this time the Queene of Aegypt and Aethiopia (a woman adorned with wisdom, and admirable in all other things) hauing heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Salomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person vnto the king, vnder purpose to confirme her beliefe by experience, and not by heare say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is beleueed by one or other, and is but onely grounded on relation. She therefore resolved to come and see him, & especially to make triall of his wisdom: which she narrowly sifted, by propounding certain difficult questions vnto him, which she had conceiued in her minde. She therefore repaired vnto Ierusalem with great pompe, glorie, and riches; for she brought with her certaine Camels charged with gold, odors, and precious stones of great valew. After that the king had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, hee easily comprehended in his mind those doubts which she had proposed vnto him, and gaue her a more speedie solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was rauished with the incredible wisdom of Salomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in especiall she wondered at his palace, considering the greatnesse and beautie thereof; and aboue all, the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same; wherein she perceived the great wisdom of the king: but aboue all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinarie table, and the apparell and seruice of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his seruants likewise, and the goodly order which they obserued in their seruice; moreouer the sacrifices that were euery day offered vnto God, and the care and diligence of the Priests in discharging their offices; raised her more then all the rest, when she obserued them daily: and nor able to containe her selfe within the tearms of astonishment at that she saw, she manifestly expresse how wonderfully she was affected, expresseing to the king in her plaine and publike discourse, that shee knew not what to thinke of those things which she had beheld. O King (she said) all that which a man knoweth by heare say may be misbeleued. But the renowne which is come vnto our eares as touching your riches, both those which you haue in your selfe (I meane your wisdom and prudence) as those also which your kingdom hath brought you, is neither false nor fained; which notwithstanding, yet doth it make your felicity furre lesse then that which I see before mine eyes: for report dependeth only on heare say, neither giueth it so certaine a notice of things, as the sight discovereth and representeth, when one is neere vnto the same. For mine owne part, in that I gaue no credit to the greatnesse & multitude of that I haue heard, I haue scene furre more then I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrewes to be most happie; and your seruants and friends most blessed, who are continuall witnesses and hearers of your wisdom. And each one of you ought to giue God thanks, that he hath so much loued this region & the inhabitants thereof, that he hath established you in the royall seat. I will discouer likewise, how besides her words shee expressed her affection she bare vnto the king, in testifying the same by diuerse presents which shee offered vnto him. For she gaue him twentie talents of gold; and an innumerable quantie of sweet odours and precious stones. It is said likewise, that we haue that plant which distilleth balme, and which our countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princess. Salomon for his part requited her beautifull presents with the like, which she made choise of according to her own liking: for there was nothing which she could require, which he granted not vnto her: shewing himselfe most readie to giue her satisfaction with a liberall and royall heart. When the Queene of Egypt and Aethiopia had receiued these fauours at the king hands (according as it hath been spoken) and he likewise had magnificently requited her, she returned backe againe into her owne countrey.

About the same time there was brought vnto the king from the countrey called the Region of gold, a quantie of precious stones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was employed to make supports in the Temple, and in the kings house, and to make instruments of musick likewise, as Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Leuites might praise God. Amongst all the gifts that were euery presented vnto Salomon, that which was giuen him at that time, was most excellent in greatness and beautie. But let no man thinke, that the Pine-wood (which we speake of) had any resemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants to delude their chapmen, sell for the same: For they are like vnto figge-trees, but that they are more white & clearer: which I thought good to manifest in this place, least any man should be deceived thorough ignorance, in discerning the one from the other: because the affaires of Salomon haue drawne vs to make mention of this matter. The waight of gold which this nauy brought vnto the king, was six hundred, sixtie and six talents: beside that which the merchants bought themselves; or that which the kings and princes of Arabia had sent vnto him in way of present. This gold caused he to be moulen downe, and made thereof two hundred targets, each one weighing six hundred shiles; and three hundred bucklers, each of them weighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. He caused also diuers vessels of gold and precious stones to be made for the vse of his table, labored with as elitious conceits as might be; the rest of his necessaries also were of gold: for nothing was either bought or sold for silver. For the king had many ships vpon the sea called Tharls, which vpon his command caried diuers merchandise into the remote countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and silver, and much Iuorie and Ethiopian Moores, and Apes, and this nauigation in sailing to and fro, was finished in three yeares. The renowne and fame also of *Salomon*s vertues and wisdom spread furre and neere thorough all nations: so that the kings of what country soeuer they were, had a desire to see his presence, because they beleued not the report, and desired to manifest their affection to him by magnificent presents. They therefore sent him vessels of golde and of silver, scarlet robes, and all sorts of aromatique drugges, horses and chariots, moyles and sumpter horses, wherein (as it was reported vnto them) the King tooke pleasure, by reason of their force and beautie: so that to the number of horses and chariots which he had before, there were annexed foure hundred more, which had bene sent him in way of present. For before that, he had a thousand chariots, and twentie thousand goodly horse, excellent for shape and swiftnesse: so that the like were not to be found, that were comparable with them for beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater grace was, that they had squires to backe them, who were in their pride of youth, of goodly perlonage to behold, and surpassing all other in height, hauing long locks which they daily intermixed with wires of gold, that when as the sunne did reuerberate his beams vpon their heades, they shold be more glorious and bright. The king mounted on his chariot, and apperelled in a white raiment, was accustomed to ride abroad about the sunne rise, inuironed with these yong armed men, hauing bowes and quiuers.

Ittan.

There was a certaine place called Ittan, some eight leagues distant off of Ierusalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleasant fountaines of water, whither he vually and willingly retired himselfe for his pleasure, vying in all things a most admirable prouidence & promptitude, and taking pleasure in those things that were well contriued. Hee forgot not likewise to make cauleys, but caused the hie waies that led to Ierusalem (where he made his abode) to be paved with blacke stone, both to the intent to make them more accessible for those that traualled to and fro, as to shew the magnificence and riches of his gouernment. He then diuided his Chariots, and placed them in such sort, that in euery Citie there was a prefixed number, and some few he kept about himselfe, and those Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he stored Ierusalem also with abundance of siluer, so that it was as plentifull as stones; and with Cedar wood (whereof before that time there was no quantitie) he so stored the countrey, that it was as plentifull to be had as wilde fig-trees. He commaunded the merchants of Egypt also, to buy him certain chariots drawne by two horses, for the price of six hundred dragmes of siluer, which he sent vnto the kings of Syria, and to those on the other side of Euphrates.

Salomon mar-

women is le-duced by the.

Now although he were the most magnificent and intirely beloued of God, surpassing both in prudence and riches all those that before him had the gouernment ouer the Hebrewes; yet continued he not in this estate vntill the end. For, forsaking the obseruation of the ordinances of his fathers, his latter yeeres were not correspondent to his former conuersation, which heretofore we haue declared: for he grew altogether dissolute & immoderately giuen ouer to women, and was not content onely with those of his own countrey, but tooke also strange women for his wiues, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumeans, whereby he transgressed the lawes of marriage instituted by Moses, who inhibited to marrie with those of forraigne nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods also, to gratifie and expresse the loue, which he bare vnto them: which thing the law-maker foreseeing, hee had forbidden the Israelites to marrie with those that were not of their owne nation, for feare least conforming themselves vnto forraigne fashions, they should fall and transgresse the ordinances of their forefathers; and vndertake to honour those gods, and forsake and forget the honour due vnto the true God. But Salomon transported with these brutish pleasures, made no account of these things, but tooke him wiues of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundred concubines, besides the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt: by which meanes he was exceedingly overcome by them, in so much as hee followed their examples, and was forced to giue a testimonie of the goodwill and extreame affection that he bare them, in ording his life according to the fashion of their countries. As therefore he increased in yeares, and his iudgement grew weake, he was in such sort misled, that he could not retaine in memorie the customes of his countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worship of those gods which were introduced by his wiues. Before all this he chaunced to sinne and default in the obseruation of the law, at such time as he made the similitudes of beasts of brasse to vnderprop the vessell called the great sea, and those of Lyons, which he caused to be set vnto his throne: For that action of his ill befel him, who had a most excellent and domestical example of vertue in the person of his father, besides the glorie that he had left him, by being a faithfull seruant of God; whence it came to passe, that by neglecting to followe his steppes (notwithstanding that God had exhorted him therunto by appearing vnto him at two severall times) he died most ignominiously. There came therefore vnto him a Prophet sent from God, telling him that his sinnes were manifest and notorious in Gods sight, threatening him that ere long he should repent the wickednesse hee had committed. Yet notwithstanding the realme should not be taken from him during this life, because God had promised Dauid that he should be his successor in the same: but after his death his sonne should beare the penaltie of the same, not so as all the people should reuolt, but that hee would giue ten tribes vnto his seruant, and leaue two vnto the grand child of Dauid, because hee had loued God, and by reason of the Citie of Ierusalem where it pleased him to make his habitation.

A (for which he to fore-time was admired) began to decline. Neither passed there long time after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that (God so pleasing) there rose vp an enemye against him, who was called Ader, by nation an Idumean, and of the princelie stock, who vpon this occasi- on grounded his rebellion and insurrection. For, at such time as Iobab generall of Dauids army, had conquered Idumaea, and in the space of sixe moneths defeated all the youth, and those that were capable to beare armes, he fled vnto Pharaoh king of Egypt: who entertained him very curteouslie, and gaue him an house, and lands for his maintenance, and loued him deereely when he came to mans estate: so that he married him with Taphines his wiues sister, on whom he began to sette his sonne, who was brought vp with the Kings children: who hauing intelligence in Egypt of Dauid and Iobabs death, addressed himselfe vnto Pharaoh, and besought him to giue him leaue to repaire into his owne country.

The King asked him what he wanted; or what the cause was that moued him, to be so hasty to forsake him? Notwithstanding therefore that he importuned and requested him diuers times, yet preuailed he nothing with him for that time. But when Salomons fortunes began to decline (by reason of his iniquities aboue mentioned, & the wrath of God prouoked against him) Ader by Gods permission came into Idumaea, after he was licenced by Pharaoh to depart. But being vnable to moue the people to reuolt from Salomon, by reason of the strong garrisons he held, and knowing that without hazard of his owne person, he could moue no alterations or innouation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where cōfederating himselfe with a certaine man called Raas (who was fled from his Maister Adarezer, king of Sophene, and liued like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendship with him, and a great sort of outlawes & thieues that were his followers, and went into Syria, and taking seizure of that country, proclaimed himselfe king thereof. From whence making excursions into the lands of the Israelites, hee spoiled and pillaged the same, during Salomons life time. Thus were the Hebrewes enforced to sustaine these outrages at Aders hands.

Moreover, a certaine man called Ieroboam, the sonne of Nabat, by nation a Iew, rebelled against Salomon, and raised his hopes about his estate, perswaded thereunto by a prophetic that concerned him, and incited him vnto the action. For being left very young by his father, and carefullie instructed by his mother, as soon as Salomon perceiued him to be of a noble and courageous spirit, he made him Commissarie ouer the building of the walls, at such time as he immured & fortified Ierusalem. In this office he behaued himselfe so well, that the king thought very well thereof, and in way of recompence, gaue him the estate of Generall ouer the tribe of Ioseph. Towards which, whilst he traualled from Ierusalem, a certaine Prophet met him vpon the way (who was of the citie of Silo, called Achias) who appoaching neer vnto him, & saluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themselves were present, and there renting the garment which he wore vpon his backe into twelue peeces, he commaunded Ieroboam to take tenne, telling him that God had so decreed, and how hee would rent the gouernment from Salomon, and reserve onely one tribe vnto his sonne; with that other which was annexed vnto it, by reason of the promise made vnto Dauid; and to thee (said he) he giueth the other tenne, because Salomon hath offended G O D, and addicted himselfe to the loue of strange women, & the seruice of forraigne Gods.

Now sith thou knowest the cause wherefore God hath taken the kingdom from Salomon, be thou iust, & obserue thou the lawes: for if thou behauest thy selfe in such sort as thou knowest Dauid did, a great reward of thy pietie, and recompence of thy obseruance attendeth thee: so that thou shalt become as mightie as Dauid hath been before thee. Ieroboam confirmed in great hopes by these words of the Prophet, being by nature haughtie, in yeeres young, and besides chur, desirous of authoritie; he tooke no rest, but being possessed of the place of generall, & remembring himselfe of that which had been told him by Achias, hee presently began to perswade the people to reuolt from Salomon, and to chuse him for their King. Salomon, hearing it was of this his deliberation and enterprise, sought the meanes to lay hands on him, and to put him to death: but Ieroboam preuenting him, fled vnto Susac king of Egypt, with whom he remained vntill the death of Salomon. And thus for that time escaped he punishment, and thus was he referred to the fortune of a kingdom.

The death of Salomon. Hedio & Rufinus. chap. 8. al. 4. 3. Reg. 12.

The people require Roboam to mitigate their burthen.

The wholsome aduise of the Elders. The yeare of the world, 3971. before Christ's Nativity, 993. Roboam reiecteth the aduise of the Elders, & followeth the counsaile of the younger.

The Israelites moued with their repulie, reuolt from Roboam.

BUt when Salomon was very old, he died, after he had raigned fourescore yeeres, and liued ninetie foure, and was buried in Ierusalem; of all Kings the most happy, rich, and prudent (except that sinne whereunto hee was drawn by women in his old age) of whom and those calamities that presently after befell the Hebrewes, wee haue sufficiently spoken. After the death of Salomon, as soone as his sonne Roboam (whom he begat vpon an Ammonitish woman called Nooma) succeeded him in the kingdom, the Gouernours of the people sent certaine messengers into Egypt to recall Ieroboam: who arriuing in the Cittie of Sichem, Roboam came thither also, resolving himselfe in that assembly of the Israelites, to take the kingdom vpon him by the peoples consent. To him therefore the Princes of the people resorted with Ieroboam, beseeching him that he would remit somewhat of their seruitude, and shew himselfe more mercifull then his father had been: for that vnder his gouernment they had been sorely oppressed, assuring him that by that meanes his kingdom should be the more assured, if so be he had rather be beloued then feared. He some three daies after promised them to returne an answer to their demands, and by that meanes drew them into suspition, that vpon the motion hee misliked of the offers they had proposed: for they thought it became his yeeres to be affable and ready to deserue well, yet remained there some hope in them, that they had not presently suffered the repulie. Meane while, hee calling about him his fathers friends, consulted vpon the matter, what answer he should giue the people: Who for that they wished his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perswaded him to speake familiarly vnto the people, and remitting a litle of his kinglie austeritie, to apply himselfe to the fauour & good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affabilitie he might the more easily draw their hearts vnto him, because that by a naturall inclination, subiects take delight in those kings that are courteous, who with a certaine decent familiarity, entertaine the selues amongst the. But Roboam reiecteth this counsaile of theirs (which was both good & profitable in all occasions, but especially at such time, when it is vpon the point to be infused in a kingdom): and that not without Gods providence, since contrarie to all reason he neglected the right course, and followed the peruerse: so that calling vnto him certaine young men of his owne humour and disposition, he certified them what the Elders had counsailed him, and willed the to discover their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods permission suffered them to knowe that which was expedient. For which cause they counsailed him to answer the people, that his litle finger was more great then the loynes of his father, and that if they had experimented and indured grieuances vnder him, that he would be farre more rigorous, and that if his father had chastised them with the stroke of the whip, that they should expect to be punished by him with rude torments. The king delighted herewith, supposed the answer to be answerable to the dignitie of his Empire. When as therefore the people were assembled on the third day to heare his resolution, and all of them were in suspence, expecting and desirous to heare him speak, from whome they hoped nought else but sweetness: Roboam condemning the counsaile of his friends, proposed vnto himselfe that of the young men. All which happened by the will of God, so the end that which Achias had prophesied might be fulfilled.

They roused by these his answers, no lesse then if they had bin wounded with the sword, conceived a most hartie griefe, and were displeased with him, and no lesse moued, then if they had readilye felt the mischief that was threatened: so that they beganne all of them to cry with a loud voice, That from that time forward, they had nothing to doe with Dauids alliance, neither with his succession, telling him that they would onely leaue the temple his father had builded, vnto his charge, & threatening him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were so haughtily and grieuously incensed, that (Roboam having sent vnto them Aduram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perswade them to pardon his youth, who had spoken any thing high, and vnrespectfully vnto them) they could not endure to heare him speake, but slew and welnigh ouerwhelmed him with stones. Which when Roboam perceiued (supposing that it was himselfe, who in the person of his officer was put to death, & stoned by the people) hee feared least in effect his life, and the fortune of his kingdom should fall into the like disaster. For which cause he suddenly ascended his chariot & fled to Ierusalem, where the tribe of Iuda, and that of Benjamin (by their

A their common suffrages) made him king. But as touching the rest of the people, from that daie forward they reuolted from the successors of Dauid, & proclaimed Ieroboam king of their estates. Roboam the sonne of Salomon being sore displeased herewith, assembled the two tribes of his obedience, with an intent to muster one hundredth and fourescore thousand chosen men, to make warre on Ieroboam and his people, and to enforce them by warre to acknowledge him for their Soueraigne. But God restrained him by the meanes of a prophet, who forbad him to make war, saying, that it was ill besetting that war should be waged betwixt two parties of one nation, and the rather for that this their reuolt had hapned by the will of God: by which meanes & perswasion he dismissed his army. But first of all I will rehearse that which Ieroboam king of Israel did, and afterwards subsequently I will declare the acts of Roboam King of the two Tribes, and thus shall the course of the historie continue in due order euery waies.

B After that Ieroboam had planted his royall court in the citie of Sichem, he made his ordinarie abode in that place, except that sometimes he sojourned in the Citie of Phanael. Not long after this, the feast of Tabernacles being at hand, Ieroboam (supposing that if hee permitted the people to goe vp and worship God in Ierusalem, & solemnize the feast in that place, they might either repent themselves of the reuolt, or being retained and withdrawne by the temple & seruice that was celebrated therein, they might be perswaded to forsake him, and submit themselves to their first King; and by that meanes hee might bee drawne into danger of his life) practised and plotted this inuention. Hee caused two golden calves to bee cast, and builded two eyerall temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan (which is situate neere vnto the source of little

C Iordan.) In each of the chappels of these two townes, he placed one of these calves, and afterwards assembling the ten tribes that were vnder his subiection, he spake vnto them in manner following: My friends and countrey-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot bee any place wherein hee asisteth not, nor time wherein hee heareth and beholdeth them not, that serue him with true affection: For which cause I thinke it not convenient, that you go vp vnto Ierusalem at this time, which is a Citie enemy vnto vs; neither that you make so long a iourney in way of deuotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, euen as I haue consecrated two golden calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan; to the end that euery one of you that inhabit neere vnto those Cities, transporting your selues to the same, may adore God. Neither shall you want Priests and Leuites: for I will elect some such among

D you, to the intent you haue no more neede of the tribe of Levi, or the sonnes of Aaron. Whosoever therefore amongst you would bee a priest, let him offer calves and muttrons vnto God: which as it is reported Aaron the first priest did. By such like speeches seduced hee the people, and caused them to fall from their forefathers religion, and transgresse the ordinances of their countrey, and this was the beginning of all those mischiefs that afterwards fell vpon the Hebrewes: by which meanes being ouercome in warre, they fell into captiuitie and subiection of strangers (whereof we wil intreat further in place convenient.) Now when the feast of Tabernacles (which hapned in the seuenth moneth) was at hand, he himselfe intended to celebrate in Bethel after the same maner, as the two other tribes had feasted in Ierusalem, & erected an altar before the calfe, and was himselfe the high priest, ascending vp to the altar being assisted by the priests.

E Now at such time as he was about to sacrifice, & to offer vp burnt offerings in the sight of the people, there came a Prophet and stood by him called Iadon (sent from Ierusalem by the commandement of God, who standing vp in the midst of the people, and in the hearing of the king, turned himselfe towards the altar, and spake after this maner: Thou Altar, Thou Altar (thus saith the Lord) there shall a man rise of the tribe of Dauid called Josias, hee shall kill vpon thee the false prophets of his time, and shall burne the bones of the deceiuers and seducers vpon thee: And to the intent that each man may beleue that this prophetic is true, it shall bee confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar shall sodainly breake, and the fat of the sacrifices that are laid thereon, shall be powred on the ground. Ieroboam displeased with these words of the Prophet, stretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that hee stretched out, became instantly withered, so that he could no more draw it backe againe to himselfe, but held it hanging downe astonished and mortified. On the other side, the altar cleft in twaine, & all that was thereon fell downe, according as the Prophet had foretold.) The King perceiuing that the man had a true and diuine spirit of Prophecie, be sought him to pray vnto God, that his hand might be restored him againe in his full strength and vigor: which he performed: so that his hand recovered againe his naturall abilitie; wherewith Ieroboam was verie much contented, and inuited the Prophet to dine with him. But Iadon answered him and said, that hee neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the Citie, because God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him that it was not lawfull for him to returne the same way that hee came. But the King admiring at the continencie of the man, began the more seriously to suspect his estate, and (coniciding by those things which hee had both seene and heard) hee diuined the assured disaster of his estate and fortunes. There dwelt in that Citie a certaine false Prophet, whom Ieroboam held in great honour (in that hee footed him vp in whatsoever was best pleasing to his eares.) This man at that time lay sicke vpon his bedde, beinge faint thorow age; and when hee was enformed by his sonne that there was a Prophet come from Ierusalem, and what wonders hee had wrought, and how Ieroboam by his prayers recovered againe his withered hand; hee fearing least the King should make more account of this stranger, then of himselfe, commanded his sonnes presently to saddle his Asse, and to haue him in a readinesse against his departure. Which when they had hastily performed, hee mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom hee ouertooke, where hee rested himselfe vnder a thicke and shadowy Oake, and vpon the first encounter, saluted him, and afterwards expostulated with him, for that he had not visited him, neither accepted of that hospitalitie which hee willingly would haue afforded him. Iadon answered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taste any kinde of sustenance in any mans house, that dwelt within that Citie. Truly, said the other, with methow mightest eate, for I also am a Prophet, and honour the same God that thou doest: and now also come I vnto thee by his commandement, to conuict thee back again into my house, & to enter-taine thee with a friendly dinner. These words of the false Prophet made Iadon credulous, for he returned backe againe with him. But as they fate at their banquet and were making merrie together, God appeared vnto Iadon and said vnto him; that since he had broken his commandement, hee should suffer punishment for the same: and withall expressed vnto him the manner: which was, that in his returne homewards, he should be torne in pieces by a Lion; and that he should not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Ieroboam should not respect Iadons words, who had been found a liar. As therefore Iadon returned backe to Ierusalem, a Lion met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Asse and slew him, yet offered he no violence to the Asse that bare him, which hee pre-ferued with the body of the prophet, standing fast by the same, vntill such time as certaine passengers beholding the spectacle, brought newes thereof into the towne vnto the false Prophet, who sent his sonnes to bring backe the body: which by their assistance hee honourably buried, charging them that after his death they should burie his bodie by him, assuring them that all that which he had propheticd against that Citie, against the altar, the Priests, and false prophets, was verie true. And as touching himselfe, hee commaunded that after his decease they should burie him by him, because that being buried with him, there might no difference bee made betwixt their bones, and his toombe might bee more honoured. When as therefore hee had interred the prophet and giuen his sonne these things in charge (being other waies a most wicked and impious man) hee addressed himselfe vnto Ieroboam, and said vnto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his hand, and assured him that hee accounted him a true and diuine prophet, and one sent by God. But the false prophet began most maliciously to ouerthrow his opinion, & disguise the truth of that which had hapned, by his perswasive words. For he informed himselfe to infer, that his hand was astonished thorow the trauel he had taken in bearing the sacrifices, & that after he had a little rested, that it came into his own naturall estate againe: & that the altar being freshly built, & diuers great sacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twain, & fel down thorow the waigh-tinesse of the charge. Consequently hee declared vnto him the death of him, that had foretold these signes that were to come, and how he had been slaine by a Lion: For which cause hee perswaded him to thinke that he in no sort was a Prophet, neither any waies partaking with the truth of prophetic. By such like allegations hee made the king beleue that which hee said; and hauing wholly distracted his thoughts from God and good workes, and obseruation of Gods lawes, he drew him to all wickednesse and impietie: by which act of his hee outraged God, and offended his lawes, and sought daily after no other thing, then to inuent some new and curied wickedness, that was farre more hainous then all that which before time he had attempted. This is all that at this time wee haue to write, as concerning Ieroboam.

As touching Roboam Salomons sonne (who was King of the two Tribes, as wee haue before this declared) hee builded these great and strong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethsur, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Marefa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and Hebron, which

OF THE IEWEES. THE VII. BOOKE.

A which being within the confines of Iuda, hee builded first. Hee builded also other great Cities in the countrey of the Beniamites, which hee walled, and placed garrisons and garrisons in euery one of them, & great store of corne, wine and oyle, and generally in euery Citie he made a great store house with all sorts of provision, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets & lances.
 To him the Priests and Leuites annexed themselves, who were dispersed thorow Iuda, who came and dwelt in Ierusalem, for they took no pleasure to adore by compulsion those places that Ieroboam had erected, and during the terme of three yeeres, they increased the kingdome of Roboam: who being married to one of his own line had three children, & was afterwards married also with Machab, the daughter of Thamar, daughter to Abialan, who was of hisp marriage likewise of whom he begat his sonne called Abialan. Hee had also diuers other children by other women, but above all the rest hee loued Machab most tenderly. Hee had eighteene legitimate wiues, married vnto him according to the law, and thirty concubines, hee had eight and twenty sonnes, and threecore daughters, & declared for his successor in the kingdome Abialan the son of Machab, and committed all his treasures & strong forres vnto his hands. But Roboam was most wholly corrupted by the vnward flatteries of waiering fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Roboam seeing his kingdome thus increased, he bent himselfe to all vniust and impious actions, and contemned the seruice of God: the people also conformed themselves to his impieties. For the life of the subiect is oftentimes peruered by reason of the corrupt & dissolute life of their princes; and those that are inferiours, beholding the vray of their superiours, willingly bee with-drawne from all modestie and follow the vices they professe, as if they had bene their professed vertues: for should they doe the contrary, they should seeme to diannull and mislike the actions of their Princes: As it hapned vnder the government of Roboam, wherein the subiects addicted themselves to impietie, and all errors: for they would not make profession of honestie, for feare least they should seeme to studie the meanes to be offensive vnto the king.

Sufac king of Egypt after the spoile of Ierusalem, transporteth the riches of that Citie into Egypt.

BUT God sent Sufac king of Egypt to take vengeance for that excesse, which was committed against his maiestie by Roboam (whose actions Herodotus wrongfully ascribeth to Sesoftris.) For this Sufac in the fift yeere of Roboam, raigne assembled a huge army of diuers thousands of men, and brought them out against Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelue hundred chariots, threecore thousand horsemen, & foure hundred thousand footmen. The greater part of these were Libyans and Ethiopians, breaking in therefore into the Hebrewes countrey with this power, without stroke striking hee seized the strongest places of the kingdome of Roboam, and fortified them, and at last came and incamped before Ierusalem.
 But Roboam and his associates, seeing themselves begirt with a strong siege on euery side by Su-facs army; at last had his recourse vnto prayers: yet could he not moue God to encline & fauour him with the victorie. For the prophet Samas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like sort, as they had forsaken him and his seruice. Which when they heard, they sodainly lost their hearts, and seeing no meanes to escape, they all of them began to confesse that God had iustly forsaken them, because they had shewed their impietie against him, and had peruered all his lawes. But God seeing them thus disposed, and making confession of their sinnes, said vnto the Prophet, that he would utterly destroy them: yet notwithstanding that he would deliuer them into the hands of the Egyptians, to the end that they might learne whether it were more difficult to serue God, or men. When as therefore king Sufac had without bloudshed or resist taken and surprised the Citie, and was receiued into the same by discomfited Roboam; hee kept not those conventions that were made betwixt them, but spoiled the temple, and tooke away with him those treasures that were dedicated vnto God, and the seruice of the King, rauishing from thence innumerable thousands of golde and of silver, nor leauing anything behind him. Hee carried away also those Targets and bucklers of gold, which were made by King Salomon: neither left he behind him the quier of gold, which was offered by Dauid, & receiued by him of the king of Sophena: Which done, he retired back againe into his own countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnassus make mention (who differeth only in the name of the king) and saith that he assailed diuers nations, and subdued Palestina and Syria, and ooke many men prisoners without any resist: whereby it is manifest that he meant no less the that our nation hath been overcome by the Egyptian. For hee saith that in their gates who yet ded themselves vnto him without inforcement, he erected pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. But our king Roboam yielded vnto the Cittie into his hands without contradiction. It is said that the Ethiopians haue learnt of the Egyptians the vie of circucision of the prepuce. For the Phelicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confesse that they haue learnt of the Egyptians. But it is a matter very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestine of Syria, but our selues. But let each one speake of these things, according as his list.

After the death of Sisac, king Roboam made shields and bucklers of brasse, in stead of those of gold, and gaue the like number vnto his guard, and in stead of sitting in a braue army, in a roiall & princely estate, he reigned after a feeble and fearefull manner, being all his lifetime enemy to Roboam. He died after he had liued fiftie seauen yeeres, whereof hee reigned 17. Hee was a haughtie and vndiscreet man, who lost his estate, because he wold not giue credit to his fathers friends.

Hee was buried in Ierusalem in the sepulcher of the kings, and his sonne Abias succeeded him in his raigne, at such time as Ieroboam had already reigned eightene yeeres ouer the tenne tribes.

Thus were these things terminated. It behoueth now at this present to declare that which Iero-boam did afterwards, and how he died. He, obseruing no meane or end of his impietie, imployed himselfe continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrificers. But God with-held not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posteritie. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimes was sicke about that time, he commaunded his wife to lay aside her royall garment, and to apparrell herselfe like a comon woman, and afterwards to goe to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that hee was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, & had foretold him that hee should be king: for which cause he willed her to repaire vnto him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her sonne should escape that sicknes. Whereupon shee disguised her selfe according as her husband had commaunded her, and came vnto the Cittie of Silo where Achias dwelt: and as she was vpon entering his house (notwithstanding hee had lost his sight thorow age) God appeared vnto him, and certified him in these two points: first that Ieroboams wife came vnto him; and next, all that he should answere to her demaund. At such time therefore as shee entered into his house, after the guile of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loud voice, Enter thou wife of Ieroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy selfe? Thou canst not hide thy selfe from God, who hath certified me of thy coming, and hath informed me what answere I shall giue vnto thee. Hee therefore said vnto her, that she should returne vnto her husband, and certifie him of Gods an-swere to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I haue made thee great; & hauing dis-membred the kingdom from Dauids posteritie, I haue giuen it vnto thee: but thou hast forgotten the same; and hauing forsaken my seruice, hast molten downe new gods, whom thou honorest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posteritie, and cast them off for a prey vnto dogs, and fowles of the aire. For I will constitute a king ouer my people that shall leaue no one of Ieroboams race alieue. The people also shall haue part of this punishment, & shall be deprived of this their fruitfull country, and be scattered among the regions on the other side of Euphrates, because they haue followed the impieties of their king, and adoring those gods that were forged by him, haue giuen ouer my sacrifice. And, as concerning thy selfe (O woman) haste thee, and cer-tifie thy husband of these things. For thou shalt find thy son dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the Cittie, but he shall finish his daies. Hee shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in generall. For he onely was good of all the race of Ieroboam.

When Achias had finished his prophetic, the woman started backe, sore troubled and dismaied throw the danger of her son, and went lamenting onward on her way, wounded with the future death of him, & by reason of her so earnest affection, she was afflicted with incredible torments. The haste which the vied was importunate, because of her son whom she should see dead; by so much the sooner she hastened homeward, but it behoued her to vie expedition in the behalfe of her husband. Whenas therefore she was arrived, she found her sonne expiring, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited the rest vnto Ieroboam.

CHAP. V.

Ieroboams expedition against the sonne of Roboam, the overthrow of his armie, and how Balances reuered out the whole posteritie of Ieroboam, and made himselfe king.

Ieroboam was nothing moued heere with, but leuied a great armie, with an intent to make warre against Abias the son of Roboam, who had obtained his fathers kingdome ouer the two tribes. For he despised him because he was young in yeeres. This notwithstanding, the young king was no whit dismayd (although hee vnderstood of Abias comming) but with greater wisdom then was incident to his yeeres, and beyond all expectation of his forward aduersarie, he leuied an armie of two tribes, with which hee encountered Ieroboam at the mountaine of Samaria; where incamping his host neere vnto him, hee provided all things in a readinesse that were requisite for the battell, & had with him foure hundred thousand fighting men, but Ieroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to giue the allarum and charge, Abias stood vp in a certaine high place fro whence he might be seene and heard, and making a signe with his hand, he required that Ieroboam & the people would first of all heare him peaceably: which granted to him, and each one attending in silence, he brake out into these words; There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promised the kingdom to Dauid & his posteritie for euer; I therefore greatly admire how you haue reuelted from my father, to submit your selues to Ieroboam his seruant, whom at this present you accompany to warre against those whom God hath ordained to raigne, and to take the kingdom from them, the greater part whereof Ieroboam vsurpeth vniuistly euen at this day; and which, as I suppose he shall not enioy long time. For he shall be punished by God, and shall cease to contradict his lawes, and to dishonour them as hee doth continually, in perswading you to doe the like.

You haue receiued no iniurie at my fathers hands: but by reason that hee was misled by the finister counsailes of certaine wicked persons, & spake vnto you certaine words which in apparence seemed vsfitting in your eares, you haue forsaken him in your displeasure: but in effect, you haue separated your selues from God and his commaundements. Truly you should haue pardoned a young man vntrained and vntaught in Oratorie, not onely for the rude words which hee vsed, but although his youth and ignorance should haue moued him to commit some churlish and indiscreet action and error, yet should you haue endured the same. For the fathers demerits ought to serue and satisfie the childrens defects. But you haue had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this present, but lead forth a great armie against vs. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victorie? Is it on your calues of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountaines? which are witnesses of your impietie and irreligion. Is it your great number that surpasseth ours by far, that maketh you confident? Truly the force of many thousands is of no value, whereas the army fight-teth in an vniuist quarrell. For in onely iustice and pietie towards God, consisteth the most assured hope of obtaining victorie ouer a mans enemies: which must needs bee on our side, who obserue at all times the ordinances and seruices of our God, who mens hands haue not fashioned of cor-ruptible matter, nor the subtiltie of a cunning king could not forge to deceiue a comunalitie, but such a one, whose worke is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore aduise you, that presentlie you repent your selues, and that taking a better way you desist from your warre, and acknowledge the lawes of your forefathers; finally, those ordinances, which haue aduanced you to so great felicitie.

Thus spake Abias to the people. But whilst hee yet continued his discourse, Ieroboam sent certaine of his souldiers by by-waies to inclose Abias within two streights, before his followers could discouer them. Now when Abias was thus inclosed in the midst of his enemies, his armie began to be discomfited, and to lose their courage: but he encouraged them, & exhorted them to put their trust in God, who could not be inclosed by his enemies: so that all together hauing called vpon God to assist them, & after that the Priests had sounded the trumpet, they thrust in amongst their enemies with a great shout, and God so blinded the vnderstanding, & abated the force of Ieroboams souldiers, that they fled: & those on Abias side had the vpper hand. Neuer was there war recorded by the historians either amongst the Greeks or Barbarians, that was pursued with so great a slaughter as the army of Ieroboam: whereby it appeared that this wonderfull and admirable victorie came fro God. For they discomfited fise hundred thousand of their enemies, and tooke their most defended places by force and spoiled them. Bethel and Ithan also with their lands and signories belonging vnto them: so that as long as Abias liued, Ieroboam was neuer able to get the better of force to raise any power since the losse he receiued. Abias suruiued after this his victorie onlie for the space of 3 yeeres; and was buried in Ierusalem, in the Sepulcher of his ancestors, leauing twentie two sonnes and sixteene daughters behind him, all which he began on fortie women. His sonne Asa succeeded him in the kingdom; whose mother was called Maacha: vnder his government the country of Israel enioyed a firme peace for the terme of ten yeeres. This is that which we haue obserued of Abias; sonne of Roboam, the sonne of Solomon, who reigned in the tenth Tribes died likewise after he had reigned twentie two yeeres, and Asa his sonne succeeded him at such time as Asa had already reigned two yeeres. The sonne of Ieroboam gouerned two yeeres, resembling his father in impietie and wickednesse. During these two yeeres, he made war against Gabaa, a Cittie of the Philistines, and encamped thereabout: so that he was forced by being betwixt by the treacherie of a certaine friend of his called Basa, the sonne of Maachabed. This Basa taking possession of the kingdom, exterminated all the posteritie of Ieroboam; and it came to passe that they of Ieroboams race that did in the Cittie were some in pieces, and deuoured by dogges; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey vnto birds, according as Gods prophet had pronounced. By this meane the house of Ieroboam suffered a deserved punishment, for their impietie and wickednesse.

CHAP. VI.

The Ethiopians besiege Ierusalem during the reign of Asa, and are overcome.

Hed to 8. Rub. 6. chap. 11. al. 8. Alias pietie.

R Vt Asa king of Ierusalem, was a man of vpright and honest life, and such a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprised he any thing, that had not a naturall relation to pietie, and the precept of the lawes. Hee corrected whatsoever was vitious and irregular in his kingdom, redressing whatsoever was erroneous in the same, and purging it fro all impietie. Hee had an army of three hundred thousand men of the tribe of Iuda, armed with bucklers and iauelins, and two hundred & fiftie thousand of the tribe of Benjamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After hee had reigned ten yeeres, Zareus king of Ethiopia came out against him, with a great armie of nine hundred thousand footmen, and one hundred thousand horsemen, with three hundred chariots, and destroyed all the land as farre as Marefa, a Cittie of Iuda: in vvhich place Asa came and met with him, and opposed army against army in the valley of Saphath, nor farre from the Cittie. Where seeing the great number of the Ethiopians, hee besought God that he would giue him the victorie and slaughter of diuers thousands of his enemies: for he said that he came out against Zareus, not assuring himselfe in any other thing, except onely of Gods assistance, who had the power to make a handfull of men superiours ouer many, and the feeble to overcome the mightie.

Asas victorie.

Whilst Asa prayed thus vnto God, a certaine signe of victorie was giuen him; so that, reioyced and confirmed in that God had giuen him a token that he wold assit him, he assailed his enemies, and slew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the rest that were put to flight, he pursued them as farre as the country of Gerar; and after they had conquered their enemies, they sacked the citie of Gerar, and brought from thence a great masse of gold, and a huge quantitie of bootie, with Cantels, dromodaries, and herds of diuers kinds of cattell.

The exhortation of Azari as the prophet.

2. Paral. 15.

When Asa and his had thus by this meane obtained at Gods hands such a victorie, & so great riches, they returned back againe to Ierusalem: & when they drew neere vnto the citie, the prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who staid them, and beganne after this manner to speake vnto them: That sith they had obtained from God so notable a victorie, they ought to behaue themselves like vertuous men, and such as feared God, conforming themselves vnto his will in all things; protesting that if they persisted in the same, God would giue them the continuall victory ouer their enemies; and besides that, happy life: but if they forooke the seruice of God, that all things should fall out contrarie vnto them. That the time should come, when neither true Prophet or priest should be found amongst them, that should instruct them in righteousnesse, when their Citties should be ouerthrowne, & their nation should be scattered ouer the face of the whole earth, and liue like wanderers and vagabonds. In the meane while therefore, while they had time, he counsell'd them to liue vprightly, wishing them that they would not deprime themselves of that fauour which God bare vnto them. When the King and all the people heard these words, they were very ioyfull, and euery one both in generall and particular, were carefull to serue God. The King

A King also sent out certaine Deputies ouer the countrey, who were charged to see the lawes due obserued and executed. In this estate were the affaires of Asa king of the two Tribes.

Now will I returne to Basa king of the multitude of Israel, who (hauing slaine Adab the son of Ieroboam) vsurped the kingdom. He made his aboad in the citie of Therla, and reigned foure and twentie yeeres, shewing himselfe more wicked & impious, then either Ieroboam or his sonne had bin. He plagued the people many waies, & dishonoured God very greatly, who sent the prophet Gimon vnto him, to foretell him that his whole race should perill, and that his house should be persecuted with as many miseries as himselfe had inflicted on Ieroboams posteritie: because that hauing receiued the government from God, hee shewed himselfe vngratefull vnto him for his goodnesse, and gouerned his people impiously and vnjustly: whereas iustice & pietie are both

B profitable vnto those that practise them, and wel-pleasing vnto God. Further, in that he had conformed himselfe in life, to the dissolute course that Ieroboam vsed, and was wholly contaminated with all his vices, hee might assure himselfe that resembling him in wickednesse, hee should undoubtedly equall him in punishment. When Basa heard all those euils (that should shortly fall on him and his posteritie, by reason of his wickednesse) hee redeemed not the time, neither deuoured himselfe to gaine the reputation of a reconciled life, or to obtaine pardon at Gods hands, by repenting himselfe of his forepassed sins: but euen as they that haue a recompence propoied vnto them to make them more affectionate in exploiting any thing, do diligently incauour themselves to performe the same: so Basa, notwithstanding the Prophet had fore-told him of that which should happen, persisted in his wickednesse as if it had been in vertue, and became worke

C and worse, to the vtter ruine and confusion both of him and his household: & daily added himselfe vnto all wickednesse, with no lesse greedinesse, then if hee had enterprised to beare away the honour in such a combat. In the end he assembled an armie, & assailed Ramath once more, which was a great Cittie some foure leagues distant off of Ierusalem: which he tooke, and determined to leaue a garrison therein, and fortified the same; with a resolution, from thence to make his roads into Asas kingdom. But Asa fearing the inuasion of his enemy, & considering that the souldiers vvho were left in Ramath, did most grieuouly spoile all the dominions that were vnder him, sent Embassadors to the king of Damasco with gold and siluer, to induce him to a societie in warre, and to renew that amitie betwene them, which was confirmed betwixt both their fathers. Who willingly receiued those treasures that were sent him, and made a league with him, and brake the truce which he had with Basa: so that he sent the gouernours of his dominions against those citie that were vnder Basas subiection, with commandement to destroy them.

D Of these they burned some, and ranlacked other some, amongst which were Elon, Dan, and Abellane. Which when the King of Israel vnderstood, he gaue ouer the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition returned to yeeld those of his subiects his assistance, who were vtterly distracted. But Asa in the meane while builded two strong townes, Gabath and Maspha, of that stuffe which Basa had prepared to build withall. Basa afterwards (preuented by the common debt of death) had no more opportunitie to make warre against Asa. He was buried in the Cittie of Arsane, and his sonne Elia succeeded him in the kingdom: who after he had reigned some two yeeres, was traiterously slaine by Zamri, a captain of a halfe regiment of horsemen. For whilst Elia banquetted with Ofa, vvho was the Steward of his house, Zamri wrought so effectually, that he perswaded some of his horsemen to assault Elia, who at that time was alone, and destitute of men of war and captaines; for that all of them were at the siege of Gabathon, a citie of the Philistines.

CHAP. VII.

Basies offspring being extinct among the Israelites, Zamri reigned in Israel; and after him Amri, and his sonne Achab.

F After that Elia was slaine, Zamri tooke the kingdom vpon him, & wholly rooted out Basas posteritie (according as the prophet Gimon had foretold.) For after the same manner was his family vtterly ouerthrowne for their impietie, as Ieroboams progenie was extinguished for their iniquitie (as we haue to-fore-time declared.) For the army which besieged Gabathon, hearing newes of the kings death, and that Zamri had murdered him, and seised the kingdom, they made Amri generall of the army, and annointed him for their king: vvho leuying the siege before Gabathon, came before the royall citie of Therla, which hee besieged & tooke perforce. Zamri seeing the citie destitute of defence, had retired himselfe into the most most secret and retired place of the palace; where setting it on fire, he burned both himselfe and it, after he had reigned seauen daies. Suddainly after this, the Israelites fell at controuersie amongst themselves, because that some of them sought to preferre Thaman to the kingdom, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amris side had the better, and being of the better sort, slew Thaman, and made Amri soueraigne over the people. The thirteenth yeere of Asa, Amri began his raigne, and was king for twelue yeeres space; sixe yeeres gouerned he in Thersa; and fixe in Marcon (which the Greekes call Samaria) himselfe imposed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had giuen him the land on which he builded this Citie. Hee differed in nothing from the other kings his predecessors, but in that he was worse then any of the other; for all of them buied their heads on this thing onely, that by daily impieties they might alienate the people from God. For which cause God being displeased, caused the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguished both the posteritie and name of one another. This Amri died in Samaria, and Achab his sonne was his successor.

Heereby a man may truly and easily perceiue, what care the diuine maiestic hath of humane affaires, & how he loucheth the virtuous, & vicerly rooteth out the vicious. For the kings of Israel, through their impietie, in a short and successiue course the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with all their families. But Asa (king of Ierusalem and the two Tribes) liuing happily in the fauour of God, for his pietie and iustice attained to a reuerend and old age: and after he had reigned one and fortie yeeres, he died a good death. And after his decease, Iosaphat his sonne (whom hee begat on his mother Abida) succeeded him; who in all things that concerned either pietie or fortitude, seemed to emulate & equall his grandfather Dauid, according as it shall be declared heereafter. But Achab king of Israel made his aboad in Samaria, & gouerned the kingdom for the space of twentie two yeeres, without any alteration of those ordinances which his progenitors kings of Israel had established; but that he exceeded them daily in complotting worse wickednesse. For he imitated all their impieties and wickednesse (but especially the Apostasie of Ieroboam) for he adored those calues that were erected by him; and besides that, hee added farre worse impieties then the former. He rooke to wife Jezebel the daughter of Itobal king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom hee learned to adore the gods of her nation: for shee was a busie and audacious woman, and of such immeasurable madnesse, that shee feared not to build a temple in honour of Bel the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furnished with all kind of trees, and to ordaine priests and false prophets also in honor of that god. The king also rooked light to haue these kinds of men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other kings before him in madnesse & malice. To him came a certaine prophet sent by the Almighty God, that was borne in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he foreprophesied, that neither dew nor rain should fall on the earth a long time, vntil that himselfe, who was prepared to depart from him, should appeare againe vnto him: and binding the same with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himselfe to the Southward, where he liued by a certaine riuer, from whence hee fetcht his drinke: for his meat was daily brought him by certaine Crowes.

Now when the riuer thorow want of raine was waxen dry, God commanded him to repaire vnto Sareptha (a Citie not farre from Sidon and Tyre, and situate in the midst betweene them both) where he should find a widow woman, who should furnish him with food. As soone therefore as he drew neere vnto the gate, he saw a woman that liued by her labour, gathering of sticks; and God gaue him to vnderstand that it was she who should nourish him. Whereupon hee came vnto her and saluted her, praying her that she would bring him some water to coole his thirst; & as she was ready to depart, he called her backe againe, and willed her to bring him some bread also. Whereupon she swore that shee had nothing in her house, but a handfull of flower and a little oyle, and that she was come forth to gather sticks, to the end she might bake the same, and make bread for her selfe and her sonne, and when they had eaten the same, they must needly perish thorow famine, because they had not any thing more left them. Go, said the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceiue better hopes, and when thou hast prepared meate for me, bring it me: for I tell thee that thy pitcher of meale shall neither faile, nor thy pot of oyle be empty, vntill that God send raine vpon the earth. When the Prophet had spoken thus, shee approached neere vnto him, and performed that which he commanded, and she herselfe had sufficient to feed vpon, and shee gaue the rest vnto her sonne and to the Prophet: so that they wanted nothing so long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this default of raine, in the acts of Itobal king of the Tyrians, speaking after this manner. In this time there was a season without raine, from the moneth of October

A October vntill October in the next yeere after, but vpon his supplication and request there fell great store of thunder. He builded the citie of Botris in Phenicia & Auzate in Libya. Doubtlesse he expressed heereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Itobale reigned over the Tyrians, as Menander testifieth in his historie. This woman (of whom we haue spoken heretofore, that nourished the Prophet) seeing her sonne fallen sick, & lying senselesse, as if he had been already dead, or yielding vp of the ghost; wept, and brake out into such passionate lamentations, as were answerable to her desolate estate; & said, that the cause of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her house, and had discovered her sinnes, and that for the same cause her sonne was dead. But he recomfited her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the child vnto him, assuring her that he would restore him to life.

B Now when she had brought him, hee rooke the child and bare him into his lodging where hee remained, and laid him on his bed, and cried out vnto God, saying, that he had but slenderie recompensed her that had receiued and nourished him, if so be her sonne should be taken from her: he therefore besought him, that he would returne the soule into the body, and restore life vnto the infant. Whereupon, G O D hauing compassion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might suppose that hee came vnto her to endamage her; he restored the child to life beyond all expectation. For which the mother gaue thanks vnto the Prophet, saying, that by this meanes she was thorowly perswaded, that G O D had (spoken vnto him. Not long after, he sought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him vnderstand that he should haue raine. At that time the famine reigned over the whole country, Elias is sent by God to prophesie raine to Achab.

C and there was great want of necessary victuals; so that men did not onely faint for want of bread, but the earth also for want of raine, could not bring forth that which was requisite for the sustenance of horses and other cattell. The king therefore calling Obediah vnto him (who was the master of his herds) hee commanded him that hee should each way seeke out for fountaines and brookes, willing him that if he found out any grasse, he should mowe the same, and giue it to his cattell for their sustenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was sought in diuers places, and could not be found: he willed Obediah also to follow him. So taking both of them seuerall waies, the king followed one, and the maister of the cattell another.

This Obediah was a godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and sustained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the king, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certified him, he humbled himselfe on his face before him, Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the king, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein hee had offended him, that he would make him a minister and messenger vnto him, who had sought to kill him, & had by-laid the country to apprehend him? For there was not any streight, whither he sent not some of his men to find out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they should put him to death. Now it may so be (said he) that whilst I repaire vnto the king, the spirit of G O D wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the king not finding thee heere, and frustrate of his desire, will reuenge himselfe on my head. Be thou not therefore so secure by my danger, whereas thou maist knowe how carefull I am of such holy men as thou art, who haue deliuered a hundred Prophets from Jezebels furie, and now at this time conceale and sustaine them in secret places. Notwithstanding all these words, Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the king, & to cast off all feare, swearing vnto him by an oath, how that day he would make himselfe seen & known vnto Achab.

When Obediah had certified the king that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being fraught with indignation, said vnto him. Is it thou that heapest so much mischief on the Hebrewes heads? Art thou the man that art the cause of this sterilitie? To whom Elias replied without flattering him any waies, that it was he and his race that were the occasions of these mischiefs, because they had brought strange Gods into their country; whom they adored, and had forsaken the true God, who was and is onely to be worshipped. He therefore willed him presently to assemble all the people on the mount Carmel, & bring with him his wife and her prophets, whose number he reckoned vp: the Prophets likewise of the woods, who were in number foure hundred. When as therefore all of them being summoned by the king were gathered together in that place: Elias stood vp in the midst of them and said; How long will you liue thus, hauing both your soules and opinions dismembered and diuided? For, if you thinke that the Hebrewes God is the true and onely G O D; why follow you him not? and why keepe you not his commandments? But if you thinke that the honor belongeth not to him, but to forraine gods gods, follow you them. When Elias perceived that the people replied nothing heereunto, hee C praised them (in confirmation of that infinite and distinct power of God frō that of strange gods) that whereas he was but one onely Prophet of the true GOD at that time present, and the other were foure hundred that worshipped the false; that he might take an Oxe and kill the same, and lay it vpon wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the sacrifice; and that they also might doe the like, and call vpon their gods, and beseech them to send downe fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they should do & confirme the same by miracle, that then the true nature

This counsell of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commaunded the false Prophets first of all to chuse themselves an Oxe, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call vpon the assistance of their gods: and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and inuocation was of H no force; Elias began to mock them, saying, Why call you not out vpon your gods with aloud uocated from the morning vntill mid-day (cutting themselves with kniues and launcers, ac-stones, according to the number of the twelue tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deepe trench round about the same; and afterwards heaping wood vpon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commaunded them to fill foure tunnes with fountaine water, and to poure it vpon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receiue and drinke vp the water. Which I done, he began to pray and call vpon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power vnto his people, who had so long time run astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heauen vpon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried vp. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fel down on their faces vpon the earth, adoring one onely God: confessing him to bee the most mighty & onely true God, & auowing that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an euil & truthlesse opinion; & laying hands themselves vpon their false Prophets, they slew them by the commandment of Elias. He willed the king also to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God wold send him raine; & thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him down on the K earth, leaning his head vpon his knees: whilst thus he sate, hee commaunded his seruant also to get vp vpon a certaine rock, & to look towards the sea, & to tell him if he saw any cloudes arise in any part (for till that time the ayre had bin alwaies cleere.) His seruant hauing often ascended the rock, and returned him answere that hee saw nothing: at length mounting vp the seauenth time, in-descending he returned him this newes; that hee saw some blacke appearance in the ayre, not much vnlike vnto a mans footstep. When Elias vnderstood this, he sent vnto Achab, wishing him to retire himselfe within the Cittie before the raine fel: who had no sooner recouered the cittie of Iezrael, but that the aire was presently clouded & couered with a shower, & a vehement wind intermixed with raine fell vpon the earth, and the Prophet seised by the spirit of God, ranne vvith the kings chariot as far as Iezrael a citie of Asser. When Iezabel, *Achab*s wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slaine her prophets, she was sore displeased, & sent messengers vnto him, threatening him in like sort to reuenge her selfe on him, as he had slaine her Prophets. Vvich for that Elias feared, he fled into the citie of Bersabee, which is vpon the borders of the tribe of Iuda, bounding vpon Idumaea: in which place he left his seruant, & retired himselfe into the desert: where, whilst he praised God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was not better then others, for which cause he should desire to liue after them, he fel asleep vnder a certain tree, & after that some one had awaked him, he arose & found bread & water ready prepared, by him. Vvhen as therefore he had eaten and was recomfited, hee went vnto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses receiued the lawes from God) where finding out a hollow caue, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demaunded by a certaine voice which spake M vnto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he remained in that place, and forsooke the citi-tie; He answered, for that he had slaine the prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswa-ded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; & that for this cause he was sought for by the kings wife, that he might be done to death. The voice replied againe, and commaunded him to shew himselfe openly, assuring him that he should vnder-stand that which it behoued him to performe.

Hereupon as soone as it was day, hee forsooke the caue, hee heard an earthquake, and saw a light: and after all things were appeased, the heauenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he should in no waies be discomfited with that which he saw: for that no one of his enemies should haue power to hurt him, charging him to return vnto his house, to the intent to proclaime Iehu the son of Nimsi king of the people, and Azrael of Damascus king of the Syrians; certifying him that in his place, *Eli*zeus of the citie of Abela should be Prophet; and that the wicked people should be destroyed, the one by Azrael, & the other by Iehu. When Elias had heard these things, he returned into the country of the Hebrewes, and met *Eli*zeus the son of Saphat at the cart, and with him diuers others driuing before them twelue couple of oxen: him did he approche, and cast vpon him his garment, who instantly began thereupon to propheteize, so that forsaking his oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required he him, that before his departure, hee might take leaue of his parents; which licence when he had obtained, he committed them vnto God and followed Elias, attending on him during all the terme of his life like his discipule & seruant. This issue had the affaires of this so excellent a Prophet. But a certaine Citizen called Na-both of the Citie of Azar, had a vineyard neere vnto the lands of Achab, who required him that hee would sell him the same, at what price he thought conuenient at his owne election, to the intent he might annex the same to his owne lands, and make them all but one possession: wishing him, that if he would not sell it him for siluer, to choose in exchange thereof, any one field of his that best liked him. Naboth answered him, that he would not doe it, but that hee intended to gather the fruit of his owne land himselfe, which he had receiued as an inheritance from his father.
C The king no lesse tormented then if he had lost his owne inheritance (in that hee might not bee master of an other mans patrimony) would neither wash nor receiue any sustenance. For which cause Iezabel his wife questioned with him as touching the cause of his discontent, and how it came to passe that he neither walt, din'd, nor slept: who told her of *Naboth*s rude behaviour, and how hauing vsed all iust & reasonable composition vnto him, in abasing himselfe more then his royall authoritie permitted, he had been outraged by him, in that hee obtained nor the thing which hee requested at his hands. Hereupon Iezabel willed him to be of good cheere, aduising him, that dismissing his displeasure hee should continue his ordinarie entertainment, because she her selfe would take vpon her to reuenge him on Naboth. Whereupon she presently sent letters in *Achab*s name to the gouernours of the country, whereby she enioyned them to celebrate a fast, and to assemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth should haue a seate prepared for him, by reason of his birth & nobilitie; willing them afterwards, that suborning three impudent and false witnesses to depose against him, that he had blasphemed against God and the king: they should by this means and for this occasion, cause him to be stoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed, according as the Queene had written, and Naboth (conuinced by false witness, for scandalizing both God and the King) was stoned by the people and put to death. When Iezabel had tidings hereof, she repaired to the kings presence, and tolde him that he should enioy *Naboth*s vineyard, and disburse nothing for the same.

But God displeased with this her wickednesse, sent the Prophet Elias purposely to meete with Elias proph-Achab in *Naboth*s ground, and to tell him that hee iniustly possessed the lawfull inheritance of et a legitimate heire, whom he had done to death. As soone as the king perceiued that he came vnto him, supposing it to be vnseemely for a king to be reprov'd, hee first of all confessed the fault, and offered him to make restitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretel him that in the same place where *Naboth*s carcasse was consumed by dogs, that both his and his Queenes blood should be shed, and that all his race should be destroyed, for that they durst commit such an impietie, and so wickedly slaughter (against all law) so good and guiltlesse a Citizen.
At length Achab vpon these words was seised with displeasure, and repented for the offence hee had committed: so that apparelling himselfe in sackcloth, and walking barefoote, he tasted not any meate, but confessed his sinnes, vnder hope to appease Gods wrath. For which cause God Achab's repencertified him by the Prophet, that during his life time the punishment of his race should be deferred, because hee had repented him of his misdeeds: but that the threats and menaces should take effect in his sonnes time; all which Elias signified vnto the king.

Adad king of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two severall times with Achab, and is overthrowne by him.

3. Reg. 20.
Adads warre against Achab

The Syrians
embassage to Achab.

Whilest Achabs affaires were after this manner disposed, the sonne of Adad (that reigned ouer the Syrians, and those of Damasco) assembled the forces of his whole country, and associated with himselfe two and thirtie other kings, with whom he came and made warre against Achab. Who beinge farre inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battell, but closing vp his souldiers in his strongest cities, he himselfe retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very strong wall, and generally very hard to be surprised.) For which cause the Syrian (taking his army with him) resorted to Samaria, and encamping before the same, intended to scale and batter the Citie. But first of all hee sent a Herald to Achab, to require him to giue audience to his embassadours which he would send vnto him, by whom he should be certified what his resolution was. As soone as the King of Israel had granted them free access, the embassadours came, and (according to the kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife should beate Adads command: which if hee would confesse, and suffer him to seize so many of them as best liked him, hee would leaue the siege and batter the Citie no more. Achab gaue the embassadours commission to certifye the King of Syria, that both himselfe, and all whatsoever was his, was at his commaund. Vpon which answer the King sent a second message vnto Achab, enioyning him the next day to admit such of his seruants, as hee should send vnto him, to search his royall palace, and the houses of his friends and kinsmen, and take from thence that which was best liking, and in greatest estimate with them, and leaue the rest with him whereof they made least reckoning.

Achab amazed at this second embassage of the King of Syria, assembled his people, and certified them, that hee was ready to deliuer vp into the enemies hands his wiues and children, for their safetie and repose; & to abandon all that likewise which was in his possession (for that the Syrian had demanded no lesse at his hands in his first embassage: But that now hee required that his seruants might be admitted to ransacke all their houses, to the end they may leaue nothing therein that was worthy regard; willing by this meanes to take a pretext of making warre, knowing well (said he) that I will spare nothing that is mine for your safety. At this present hee profreth and seeketh occasion of hostilitie, proposing vnto you a thing, which is vnpleasing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithstanding, I will doe whatsoever you shall thinke good of. To this the people answered, that they could not endure that any of his demands should be listened vnto, or respected; but that the King should prepare for warre. Whereupon he called for the embassadours and dismissed them with this answer, That they should report vnto their master, that Achab persisted in those things, which first of all were required by him (because he had a desire of the conseruation of his subjects:) but as touching his second demand, that hee would no waies condescend thereunto: and thus sent he them away. When Adad heard this answer, he was sore moued and sent vnto Achab the third time, threatening him that his soldiers should make a bulwarke more highe then the wals (he so much trusted in) yea though only each of the should bring but a handfull of earth, with them (which boast he vied towards him to terrifie him, & to expresse thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppose against him.) But Achab answered, that he ought not to glory in his army, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battell. When the embassadours were returned backe, they found the king at dinner with 32. kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achabs answer. Hereupon Adad gaue commandement to begirt the City with Palliades, and to raise bulwarks of earth, and busily to intend the siege. Whilest these things were in hand, Achab was grievously troubled, and all the people with him: but at length he grew confident, and cast off all his feare, thorow the arriuall of a certaine Prophet, who said vnto him, that God promised to deliuer all those thousands of souldiers, and his boastfull enemies which hee beheld, into his hands. The same Prophet being afterwards de- maunded by him, by whose meanes this victorie might be gained? He said, that it should bee by the sonnes of the gouernours, whom the king himselfe should lead forth, by reason of their vnex- perience. Achab therefore calling vnto him the gouernours sonnes, found that their number amounted to two hundredth thirty & two: & hauing notice that the Syrians intended nought else but pleasure and banquetting, hee opened the Citie gates, and sent these yoong men out against them. Now when the sentinels of the aduerse part had discouered them, they certified Adad ther- of,

A of, who sent out certaine souldiers against them, commanding them that if they were come out in warlike sort to bid the battell, they should bring them vnto him fast bound; and if they came in peace, they should doe the like. Now had Achab within the Citie arraigned another armie, and kept them in a readines. When as therefore the yoong men had charged the Syrian guard, and slaine a great number of them, and had pursued the rest euen vnto their owne camps, Achab spying his present victory and aduantage, caused his whole armie to breake forth; who giuing an vnlooked charge vpon the enemies, discomfited the Syrians (who little expected for such a stratageme from the Hebrewes) and assailed them disarmed and drunken: so that they left both armour and weapon behind them, and fled from their campe; & their king likewise was so hor- ly pursued, that he scarcely had opportunitie to saue himselfe by the swiftnesse of his horse. Achab made a long chace in following the Syrians and slaughtering them that fled: hee spoiled their campe likewise, and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantitie of gold and siluer. He tooke Adads chariots and horses also, and with them returned backe into the citie.

But whereas by the aduice of the said prophet, he was perswaded to prepare and keepe an armie in readines against the next yeere (for that the Syrian was like, nay rather resolved to charge him againe) the King intermitted no preparation that concerned the warre. For Adad (beinge escaped from the fight with those few forces that remained after the battell) consulted with his friends, how hee might warre against the Israelites. Who aduised him from thenceforth neuer more to fight with the in mountainous places, for that their God was powerful vpon the moun- taines, and for that cause they had bene overcome by them: but if hee fought with them in the Plaine, both hee and his should bee assured to haue the vpper hand. Moreouer they counsell- ed him, that he should dismisst those kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might returne into his owne country, & that in their steede he should retaine their for- ces, ouer which he should ordaine Chiefetaines: besides (to supply their places that were lost) they aduised him to leuy horsmen and chariots thorow at his country. Adad supposing that they had discreetly counsellled him in this matter, ordered and leuyed his armie according as they had aduised him. And as soone as the spring-time was come, he assembled his army, & led them forth against the Israelites; & arriuing neere vnto the citie of Aphec, he incamped in a plaine hard by. Achab with his forces (marching out to meet with him) pitched his tents and arraigned the bat- tell neer vnto him (although he were far inferiour both in force & number.) To him the prophet D appeared anew, telling him that God would once more haue the victorie, to make it knowne that his power was not onely in the mountaines (as the Syrians perswaded themselves) but in the Plaines also. Thus continued both the armies, opposed and encamped the one against the other, for the space of six daies. On the seuenth, when the enemy forooke their trenches early in the morning, and placed themselves in battell ray; Achab drew out his army and affronted them, & presently charged them: whereafter a long and dangerous fight betwene them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them slaine in the chace. For some of them were intangled with their owne chariots, other some slew one another pell-mell; and some few of them found the meanes to flie vnto their citie of Aphec, who persished likewise to the number of seuen and twenty thousand (beinge slaine by the ruine of the walles that fell vpon them) besides one hundredth thousand men that gaue vp the ghost in that fight. But Adad attended by some of his faithful friends, went and hid himselfe in a certaine caue vnder the ground: who protesting vnto him, and concluding amongst themselves, that the kings of Israel were courteous and mercifull; and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of suppliants they might be assured and sent vnto him) Adad permitted them: Whereupon they incontinently presented themselves to Achab clothed in sackcloth; & hauing their heads wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of suppliants amongst the Syrians) telling him that Adad beought his maiesty to grant him his life; promising on his behalfe, that from thenceforth hee would alwaies continue his seruant, and acknowledge his fauour. Achab answered them, that it highly contented him that their king was as yet aliue, & had escaped from the furie of the fight, offering him by them F that good will & honour, which one brother ought to shew vnto another. After that they drew an oath from Achab, that he should offer him no wrong, if so be he discouered himselfe vnto him, and withal presently resorted vnto Adad, whom they drew out of the place where hee was hidde, and afterwards brought him vnto Achab, who was mounted vpon a chariot. Adad presented himselfe before him: but Achab stretching out his hand made him incontinently mount vp with him into his chariot, and kissed him, willing him to bee of good courage, assuring him that hee should receiue neither iniurie nor iniustice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gaue him thanks; pro- testing testing that during his life time he would neuer be forgetful of his fauours: promising him moreouer to restore vnto him those cities which his predecessors, kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gaue him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as before time his ancestors had the credite to repaire vnto Samaria.) When these accords were made and confirmed by oath, Achab gaue him many worthy presents, and sent him backe into his kingdom. Thus ended the warre betwixt Adad and the king of the Israelites. After this a certaine prophet called Micheas came vnto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him vpon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, hee prophesied vnto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods commandment, he should meet with a Lyon, which should rent him in peeces. Which coming to passe, according as it was foretold, the Prophet addressed himselfe again vnto another, commanding him to do the like: and when hee had wounded him in the head, he bound vp the wound & came vnto the king, telling him that hee had bene in warre, & had receiued a prisoner in charge from his Captaines hands: and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) he feared least he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he had threatned no lesse. Achab answered him, that he was iustly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discovered his head, and made it knowne who he was. And to this intent vsed the prophet this policie, that his words might be of greater force and value. For hee told the king that God would bend himselfe against him, because he had permitted the blasphemous Adad to depart unpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slaine by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian armie. The king displeased with the libertie and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison: and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home vnto his house.

CHAP. IX.

Of Iosaphat King of Ierusalem.

Whereto haue we spoken of Achab's estate: but now I must returne vnto Iosaphat king of Ierusalem, who hauing enlarged his kingdom, and planted garrisons in those cities that were subiect vnto him (& in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Ieroboam reigned ouer the ten tribes.) This king had perpetual assistance and fauour at Gods hands, in that he was a iust & vertuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more, then how he might please & honour God. The kings his neighbors round about him honoured him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent. In the third year of his raigne he assembled the gouernours and priests of his country, enioyning them to ride their circuit about the prouinces, and to teach the inhabitants of euerie citie the law of Moses, training them vp in the obseruance thereof, and in the studie of piety. Which all the Citizens embraced and entertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and strue the one with the other, which of them should exceede the rest in the seruice of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loued Iosaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him euerie year with sixe hundred and threescore lambs, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of war & armes against the enemie. He mustered in the tribe of Juda three hundred thousand men, ouer whom he placed Edraus Generall, & two hundred thousand vnder the conduct of Iohanan. Who besides these had two hundred thousand Archers on foote of the tribe of Beniamin. Another Chieftaine called Ochobaz leuied and led for the king one hundred and fourescore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which hee sent into defended cities.) Hee married his sonne Ioram to Athalia the daughter of Achab king of the ten tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab receiued him very curteously, and magnificently entertained his armie with bread, wine, and flesh in all abundance; requiring him to yeeld him his assistance against the king of Syria, to the intent he might recouer the citie of Ramath in the country of Galaad, which Adads father had wonne and conquered from his father. Iosaphat promised to assist him: and being no waies inferiour vnto him in force, hee sent his army from Ierusalem to Samaria. When those two kings were departed out of the citie, and each of them were seated vpon their thrones, they distributed their pay to euery one of their souldiers. At that time Iosaphat commanded, that if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to giue notice

A notice what the issue should be of this their warre against the Syrians; and whether they thought it good to make warre against them; by reason that at that time there was amitie and peace betwixt Achab & the Syrians, confirmed for the space of three years, since the time that he tooke Adad prisoner and deliuered him, to that present.

CHAP. X.

Achab fighteth against the Syrians, and is overcome and slaine in the battell.

Whereupon Achab called for the Prophets (who were in number foure hundredth) and commanded them to enquire of God whether hee would giue him the victory in that battell which he enterprised against Adad or no, and whether hee should recouer the Citie which he intended to besiege? Who answered and counsell'd him to hazard the battell, in that he should haue the vpper hand ouer the Syrian, and should take him prisoner as hee had done before time. Iosaphat vnderstanding by their words that they were false Prophets, asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certify him of that which might succeede. Achab answered, that he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him because he prophesied nought else but mishap and misery vnto him, and had foretold him that if he should fight against the Syrian, he should be overcome and slaine; and for that cause he held him at that time in prison, signifying vnto him that his name was Micheas the sonne of Imlah. Iosaphat required C that he might be brought into his presence (which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, that al the other Prophets had prophesied to the king victory.) But Micheas told him that it was not lawfull for him to lie against God, but that it concerned him to speake that which God should informe him of, concerning the king. As soon as he came before Achab, and was adured to speake the truth, hee said that God had shewed him the Israelites put to flight, and disperfed by the Syrians, that pursued them no otherwise then sheepe without their shepheard. All which signifieth no lesse (said hee) but that the rest of the people returning home in safetie, Achab onely should be slaine in the battell. When Micheas had spoken after this manner, Achab turning himselfe towards Iosaphat, said vnto him I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas constantly auowed, that he prophesied nothing but that which God had commanded him to speake, assuring Achab that he was solicited by the false prophets vnto war vnder hope of victory, whereas he should assuredly perish in the battell. These words of his made Achab much discomfited. But Sedechias one of the false prophets stepped forth, and exhorted him to set light by Micheas words, the rather for that he spake vntreuely. And in confirmation of this his allegation he alledged Elias, who was a farre more skilfull Prophet in foretelling things to come, then Micheas was; yet that the same Elias had foretold that the dogs should lick Achab's bloud in the citie of Iezrael in the field of Naboth, because Naboth had bene stoned to death by the instance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifestly, that since he contradicted a Prophet so excellent as he was, hee lyed in saying that the king should die within three daies. Moreouer (said hee) it shall appeare whether he be truly sent from God or no, if E as soon as he shall receiue a buffet from me, he cause my hand to wither, according as Iadon made Ieroboams hand shrinke, at such time as hee thought to apprehend him. For I thinke (said hee) O king, that thou art assuredly informed hereof: which said he strooke him, & for that no inconuenient fell vpon him, by reason of that his audacious attempt, Achab assured himselfe, and recouered his courage, & forwardly set forth against the Assyrian army. For as it is to be supposed, the will of God was of such power, that it caused the false prophets to triumph ouer the true: which was the cause that the false prophets were trusted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained wil might be fulfilled. But Sedechias made him yron hornes, and said vnto Achab, that God by them signified vnto him that he should ruinate all Syria. But Micheas prophesied to the contrary, that within very few daies Sedechias should walke from caue to caue to hide himselfe, F and auoid the punishment of his fallhood. Achab displeased hereat, commanded that he should be led thence, and kept prisoner with Achimon the gouernour of the citie, yeelding him no other allowance but bread and water for his sustenance. Thus marched these two kings with their armies against Ramath which is in Galaad; which when the king of Syria vnderstood, he drew his army into the field, & came out to meet with them, and incamped neere vnto Ramath. Now was Achab and Iosaphat concluded betwixt these two confederate kings, that Achab should enter the battell in a private habit, and Iosaphat should be inuested with the royall ornaments, and supply Achab's person in the battell, battell, to the intent that Micheas prediction might be made frustrate. But notwithstanding this popular disguise, Gods iustice preuented him: For Adad king of Syria commanded his army, that they should put no one of the enemy to the sword, but onely the king of Israel.

As loone as charge was giuen, the Syrians perceiuing Iosaphat in the front of the army, and coniecturing that it was Achab, they made head altogether against him, and hauing inuironed & pressed him very neerely, they perceiued that it was not he: for which cause they retyred backe againe. But although they had fought frō the morning vntill the euening, & had the vpper hand, yet slew they no man (because they fought after no other but Achab to put him to the sword) whom notwithstanding they could by no means meet withall. At length one of Adads seruants called Aman, shot at random amongst the enemies, and by fortune hurt Achab in the breast, and shot him thorow the lungs. This hurt of his concealed he from his souldiers, for feare least they should be discomforted. For which cause he commanded his coachman to driue his chariot out of the battell, for that he felt himselfe grievously and mortally wounded: and although hee were terribly pained, yet sat he in his chariot vntill sunneset; at which time his hart failed him, and he gaue vp the ghoste. When night came, the Syrian army withdrew themselves into their camp: and receiuing tidings by an Herault, that Achab was dead, euery one retired home vnto his house; but Achabs body was conueyed to Samaria, & interred in that place. As for his chariot, it was washed in the fountaine of Iezrael, because it had been bebloudied, by reason of the kings hurt; whereby the truth of Elias prediction was ratified, & confirmed: for the dogs lickt his blood; & from that time forward the common women continually washed themselves in that fountaine.

He died also in Ramath (according as Micheas had foreprophecied.) Whercas therefore all things I befortuned Achab, according as two prophets had foretold him, it appeareth that wee ought to honour and magnifie the maistie of God in all places, and to reuerence his prophecies deliuered by them, and to ascribe alwaies more credit vnto them, than to the vaine and plausible speach of such as curry fauour, and no lesse to respect them, than things of infinite profit, since by them wee are diuinely admonished what wee ought to take heed of. It behooueth vs also to consider what force the ordinance of God is of, by examining those things which befell Achab. For it is impossible to auoid the preordination of God, notwithstanding that men flatter and nourish themselves with vaine hopes, which inueigle them so far, that finally they are ouertaken in the snares thereof. For this carelesse inconsideration was fatal to king Achab, in that he beleued not his death which was foretold him; but being deceiued by the flattering perswasions of false Prophets, ran headlong vpon his owne danger and death. After him succeeded his sonne Ochozias.

CHAP. I.

Ioram Achabs sonne, ouercommeth the Moabites in battell.

As loone as King Iosaphat was returned back againe to Ierusalem (from the warre wherein he had giuen succour to Achab against Adad the king of Syria, as we haue heretofore declared) the Prophet Iehu (in his returne) came forth and met him, and reproved him because he had giuen Achab (who had been a man both impious & wicked) his assistance, assuring him that God was displeased with that his confederacie; yet notwithstanding that he of his goodnes had deliuered him from his enemies, although contrarie vnto his duetie, hee had demeaned himselfe vniustly. After this admonition, Iosaphat began to celebrate sacrifices, and to offer vp thanksgiuings and peace offerings vnto God: Which done, he rode in progresse and circuit round about those countries that were vnder his dominion, giuing order that the people should be instructed in those ordinances which were deliuered from God by the hands of Moses, and exhorted his subiects to the practise of pietie, contained in the same. Hee planted iudges likewise in euery city, commanding them to execute iustice vnto the people, without respect of any thing, but onely iustice. He charged them likewise, that they should not be corrupted with rewards, or seduced by dignitie, riches, or nobilitie, but that they should doe iustice indifferently vnto all men, knowing that God seeth all things, how secretly soeuer they be carried or contriued. Hauing in this sort ordered euery thing in each Citie of the two Tribes, he returned againe into Ierusalem, where he likewise chose iudges from amongst the Priests & Leuites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to giue vp right and exact iudgement. And if they of other cities had any causes of greater consequence (which should be referred to their finall determination) he charged them with earnest industrie, to decide them with as vp right and iust measure as might be: for that it was very conuenient that the most exact and accomplished sentences should be deliuered in that citie, where as God had his temple, & the King made his ordinarie aboad.ouer all these he placed his two friends, Amasias the Priest, and Zabadias of the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did the King dispose of his estate.

About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) assaulted and assembled themselves against him, & encamped themselves neere vnto Engaddi (a Citie situate neere vnto the lake Asphaltites, and distant from Ierusalem some three hundred foulds) in which place flourish those goodly & holsome Palm-trees, whence distilleth the pure and perfect liquor of Balme. When Iosaphat had intelligence that the enemies had past the lake, & were already farre entred into his country, he was affraid, and assembled the people of Ierusalem in the temple, and standing vp right, and turning his face toward the propitiatorie, hee besought and requested God that hee would giue him power and force to overcome his enemies. For such had been the forme of their supplication, who in times past builded the temple: namely, that it might please him to fight for that Citie, and oppose himselfe against those that durst attempt or assault that place, to the intent to dispossesse them of that country which he himselfe had giuen them in possession; & in pronouncing this praier he wept: and all the people likewise both men, women and children made their requests vnto God. Presently vpon this, a certaine Prophet called Iaziel arose vp in the midst of the congregation, and cried out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their praiers, and promised them to fight for them against their enemies, enioyning them the next day to sally out in armes, and go & make head against their aduersaries, whom they should encounter in the mountainie situate betwixt Ierusalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillocke of Sis (which place in Hebrew signifieth Eminency) willing them not to fight against them, but onely to arrest in that place, and see how GOD would fight and make warre for them. When the Prophet had spoken these words, the king & all the people prostrated themselves vpon their faces, giuing thanks vnto God and adoring: meane while the Leuites sung continuall hymnes, with instruments & voices. About the beginning of the day, the king departed into the desert that is vnder the citie of Thecoa, aduising the people to believe all that which the Prophet had said vnto them, and not to arrange themselves in battell ray: hecōmanded the Priests to march before them with their trumpets, and the Leuites that they should sing hymnes & thanksgiuing vnto God, as if (said he) our country were already deliuered from our enemies.

This aduise of the kings seemed pleasing vnto them all; so that they performed whatsoeuer he counselled the. But God sent a great terror & disorder among the Barbarians: so that supposing themselves to be enemies the one against the other, they slew one another in such sort, that of so great and huge an host, there was not one that escaped. But Iosaphat looking downe into the valley (wherin the enemies had pitched their tents) & seeing it full of dead men, reioiced greatly at the unexpected succors that God had sent him, who had giuen the victory, not by the dint of their owne swords, but by his prouidence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies camp, & to spoile the dead; & so great was the multitude of the that were slaine, that scarcely they could gather the spoiles of them in three daies space. On the fourth day, the people assembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they blessed God for the power and succours he had sent them, by reason whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the king led back his armie into Ierusalem, & for diuers daies he spent the time in offering sacrifices and making feasts. After this discomfiture of his enemies was published abroad in the eares of forraine nations, they were all of them affraid, supposing that God did manifestly expresse his power, and extend his fauour towards him. And from that time forwards, Iosaphat liued in great glory, in iustice, and pietie. Hee likewise was a friend to the king of Israel that reigned at that time, who was Achabs sonne, with whom he aduentured in a voyage by sea, intending to traffique with certaine Merchants of Tharsis, but hee had a great losse: for his ships were cast away by reason they were ouer-great; and for this cause hee had neuer more mind to exercise nauigation. Hitherto haue we spoken of Iosaphat king of Ierusalem.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs sonne, who reigned ouer Israel, and was resident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and resembled his father and mother euery way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to teroboam in wickednes, who first fell from God, and made the Israelites revolt from him. The tenth yeare of his raigne, the king of the Moabites rebelled against him, & denied to pay him those tributes which he was wont to pay vnto Achab his father. But it came to passe, that as Ochozias ascended the staires of his palace, he fell downe from the top thereof: and being sick of the fall, he sent to Accaron vnto the God called the Myiodis or flie, to enquire whether hee should recover that sicknesse or no. But the God of the Hebrewes appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to goe and meet those messengers that were sent by Ochozias, & to aske the if the people of the Israelites had not a God, but that their king sent to forraigne gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to returne and declare vnto their king, that he should not escape that sicknesse. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the messengers of the king hauing vnderstood that which was declared vnto them, returned backe againe with all expedition vnto him.

Ochozias maruailing much at their suddaine repaire, asked them the cause thereof: who answered him, that a certaine man came vnto them, who forbid them to passe any further, but to shorten their way to let your Maiestie knowe (said they) from God, that your sicknes shall wax worse and worse. Heereupon the king commaunded them to describe what manner of man hee was that spake these words vnto the: who answered, that hee was a hairie man, girded with a leathern belt. And vnderstanding hereby that it was Elias, he sent a captain with fiftie soldiers vnto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet prisoner vnto him. This captain that was sent, perceiving Elias sitting on the top of a mountaine, commanded him to come downe and repaire vnto the king, who had sent for him; which if he performed not presently and willingly, he threatened him to make him doe it perforce. Elias answered & said vnto him: To the end thou maist know by thine owne experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heauen, & consume both thee and thy souldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell downe from heauen, and consumed both the captain and his souldiers.

When the king had tidings of this losse, hee was sore displeased, & sent another captain to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatened the Prophet that if he would not willingly come downe, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias priued that fire might fall from heauen, and incontinently both hee and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had vnderstanding likewise how his second messengers had sped, hee sent a third vnto him, who being a discreet man, and courteous in condition, arriuing in the place where by chance Elias was, hee saluted him very curteously, and said vnto him, that contrarie to his owne will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the kings pleasure, he was come vnto him; & that they that were sent with him, came northither voluntarily, but by the same commaund: He therefore required him to haue compassion both of him & of his souldiers, & to vouchsafe to come downe, and to come after them vnto the king. Elias tooke pleasure in this his discreet & courteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as hee came before the kings presence, hee prophesied, and told him that God said, that sith hee had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had bene no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sicknes, but that hee had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the successe of his sicknesse: Know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophetic) hee died in such manner as Elias had fore-told him, and his brother Ioram succeeded him in the kingdom, because he departed without issue.

This Ioram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the seruice of the true God, he adored strange gods. In all things else he was a man of execution. In his time Elias was no more seene amongst men, & vntill this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a disciple behind him called Elizans (as we haue heeretofore declared.) It is written in Holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath knowne of their deaths. After that Ioram had taken possession of the kingdom, hee resolved to make war vpon Misa the king of the Moabites (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two-hundred-thousand sheepe bearing wooll.) Whenas therefore hee had assembled his forces, he sent vnto Iosaphat, requiring him that sith he had been his fathers friend; he would likewise second and lend him aide in his intended warre against the Moabites, who had as then newly revolted from his government. Iosaphat not onely promised him to yield him succours, but moreouer he assured him that he would draw the king of Idumæa (who was his subiect) into their association. When Ioram vnderstood these things by those whom hee had sent vnto Iosaphat, he tooke his army with him and repaired to Ierusalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the king of that citie: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the desert of Idumæa, and that way to charge the enemy (in that they expected nothing lesse the to be endangered on that side) these three kings departed together from Ierusalem, namely the king of Ierusalem, the king of Samaria, and the king of Idumæa. Now when they had marched some seauen daies iourney, they found a great scarcitie of water amongst the, both to water their horses, and to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especiall Ioram, who by reason of the necessitie wherewith hee was pressed, cried vnto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his hee would betray three such kings as were there present, into the hands of the king of Moab without stroke strooken. But Iosaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him; and sent into the armie to knowe whether there were any prophet of God that had followed them to the battell, to the intent (said he) that we may vnderstand by God what we ought to doe: and whereas one of the seruants of Ioram said, that he had seene Elizans the sonne of Saphat, the disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the sollicitation of Iosaphat) resorted vnto him. Now when they drew neere vnto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the army? and Ioram in especiall questioned with him: To whom Elizans answered, that hee had no reason to sollicit him in this sort, but to repaire vnto his fathers & mothers Prophets, who would certifie him the truth. Notwithstanding, Ioram intreated him that he would prophetic, and continue the preseruacion of the army, and the defence of his life: but Elizans swore by the liuing GOD, that he would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an vpright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling vnto the a certain man that could cunningly play vpon instruments (for so had the Prophet commaunded) whilst he sung, Elizans was rauished with a diuine spirit, and enioyned the Kings to make certain trenches in the channell of the riuer: for (said he) you shall see the riuer full of water without either wind, clowde, or raine: so that both the whole Armie and all their Cartell shall be saved, and

and sufficiently sustained: and God will not onely bestow these benefits on you, but will giue you the vpper hand of your enemies also; and you shall surpriseth the fairest and strongest Cities of the Moabites; and you shall cut downe their trees, ruinate their country, and fill vp their fountaines and riuers. When the Prophet had spoken thus, the next day before sunne rise the river flowed boundantly with water: for some three daies iourney off, God had suffered a very strong and fetled rain to fall in Idumæa; so that both the souldiers and their horses were sufficiently refreshed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three kings came out against them, & tooke their way thorow the desert, their king presently assembled his armie, and commanded them to keep the passages of the mountaines, to the end they might hinder the enemy from entering their country vnawares. Who beholding about the sunne rise, that the water of the river was blood red (for at that time it arose in the country of Moab, and at this houre the water is H) they conceived a false opinion, that the three kings being pressed by thirst, had laine one another, and that the river flowed with their blood. Being in this sort seduced with this imagination, they besought the king to giue them leaue to gather their chemies spoiles: which while they had obtained, they altogether considerately marched forth as if to a prey already prepared for them, and came vnto the kings camps vnder hope to find no man to resist them. But their hope deceived them: for their enemies enuironed them round about, and some of them were cut in peeces, the rest turned backe and fled towards their owne country, and the three kings entering into the territories of the Moabites destroyed their Cities, pillaged the champain country, disfigured their inclosures, filling them with stones and mud taken out of the riuer, cut downe their fairest trees, stopped vp the sources of their waters, & leuelled their walles with the ground. The king of the Moabites himselfe, seeing himselfe pursued and besieged, & that his Citie was in danger to be taken perforce, sallied out very valiantly with seven hundred men, hoping by the swiftness of his horse, to breake thorow the Israelites campe on that side where he thought it was least defended. Which when he had attempted and could not execute, because he charged on that side which was best defended, he returned backe againe into the Citie, and committed a desperate & hatefull action: for he tooke his eldest sonne, who ought in right to succede him in the kingdome, and set him on the wall of the Citie, and in the sight of all his enemies offered him for a burnt sacrifice vnto God. The kings beholding this wofull spectacle, were moued with compassion of his necessitie, and ouercome with humanitie and mercie, leuied the siege, and returned backe againe into their countries. After that Iosaphat was returned into Ierusalem, he enioyed a peaceable government, but liued not long time after this exploit, but died when he was threescore yeares old, in the five and twentieth year of his raigne, and was magnificently buried in Ierusalem, according as the successe of Dauids vertue and kingdome ought to be entombed.

4. Reg. 9.

Elizeus commanded the widow to fill her empty vessels with oyle.

He left behind him diuers children, the eldest of whom he appointed his successor in the kingdome, who was called Ioram (as his vnckle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs sonne while king of Israel.) The king of the ten tribes turning backe vnto Samaria, kept with him the prophet Elizeus, whose actions I will here recite, because they are notable & deserue to be registered in writing, according as we haue gathered them out of holy scriptures. Obedias wife (who was sometime steward of Achabs house) came vnto him & told him that hee was not ignorant that in that persecution wherein Iezabel sought to murder the prophet, how her husband had slaine one hundred of them, for whose priuate maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men; & that now being dead, his creditors stroue to draw both her and her children into seruitude. For which cause shee besought him in consideration of this act, to haue compassion on her husband, and to yeld her some succour. Hereon Elizeus asked her if she had any thing in her house who answered him, that she had nothing but a very little oyle left her in an earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow diuers empty vessels of her neighbour: that done, hee willed her to locke vp her doores, and to poure oyle into the vessels, in that it was Gods pleasure to fill them all. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the vessels were found full, so as none of them were empty: whereof when shee had certified the Prophet, hee aduised her to goe and deliuer her oyle, and pay her debts, and Samaria besieged by the Syrians.

A and when all was paid, hee assured her that there would be some remainder, that might serue to sustaine both her and her children.

By this meanes Elizeus discharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditors intended against her. He admonished Ioram likewise, by certaine messengers, that hee should take heed of a certaine place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: by means of which admonition the king went not out on hunting. But Adad being sore displeased, because his ambushment was discovered, began to suspect his owne followers: whereupon calling vnto him his household seruants, hee maliciously tearmed them traitors, and furthermore threatened them with death, for that they had discovered a matter, which was only committed to their trust, vnto his enemy. Whereupon one of the assistants told him, that he ought not to conceiue that false opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discovered his intended ambush to cut off his enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had discovered & discouraged al that which was intended against him. Whereupon he sent out his souldiers with an expresse charge, to know in what Citie Elizeus made his ordinary abode: who returning back, brought him newes that hee remained in Dothaim: For which cause Adad sent a great number of horse men and chariots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begitt the citie by night, and laide warch round about the walles, that no man might escape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets seruant had notice hereof, & was aduertised that the enemies sought to surpriseth Elizeus, hee fearefully hastened and discovered their intent to his master, who encouraged him and commanded him to shake off his feare, for that hee held himselfe both secured & assured of Gods help: whereupon he praised God that at that present he would shew his power and assistance both toward the reliefe of his necessitie, and the confirmation and encouragement of his seruant. At that time God hearing his praier, presented to the Prophets seruants sight, a number of chariots, and horsemen that inuironed Elizeus; so that hee laid his feare aside, and was assured when hee perceived these succours. That done, Elizeus besought God againe that he would blind his enemies eyes, and to cause a thicke cloud to fall vpon them, to the end they might not discover him. Which done, he presently thrust himself amongst the thickest of his enemies, demanding of the whom they came to seeke for? They answered him that they sought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promised them to deliuer him into their hands, if so be they would come with him into the Citie where he was. They blinded in eyes, and depraued in vnderstanding by God, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed king Ioram to locke the gates and to inuiron the Syrians with his souldiers. This performed, hee prayed God that he would cleere the Syrians sight, and take away the cloud that obscured their eyes, who being deliuered from their blindness, perceived that they were in the midst of their enemies. Whereat being sore astonished, and vncertaine whence this diuine and vnexpected act had befallen them, King Ioram asked the Prophet whether hee should kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbad him to doe so: for (said hee) it is a iust and conuenient matter, that they who are taken by order of warre should lose their life, but that they had done no euill vnto his country; but by Gods prouidence came thither without their owne knowledge: for which cause he counsailed him to giue them presents and present them meat, and afterwards to suffer them to depart without any iniurie.

E Ioram giuing credit to the Prophets words, entertained the Syrians magnificently and with great humanitie, and sent them backe vnto Adad their king, to whom vpon their arriual they declared all that which had hapned vnto them. Adad astonished at this vnexpected euent, and wondering at the apparition and power of the God of the Israelites; lastly admiring the Prophet whom God so wondrously assisted; he concluded fro that time forward, neuer more to attempt the king of Israel in secret, because hee feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open warre against him, hoping to haue the vpper hand of his enemies, by means of the great number and force of his army: So that he issued out with a mighty power against Ioram; who supposing himselfe to be outmatched by the Syrian army, locked himselfe vp within Samaria, putting his trust and confidence in the fortification and strength of the wals therof. Adad hoping to surpriseth the citie if not by engins, at leastwise by famine & default of things necessarie, drew neer vnto Samaria to besiege it. But Ioram was so destitute of conuenient supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of victuals, an Ases head was sold in Samaria for eightie peeces of siluer, and a measure of pignons dounge at five peeces of siluer, which they vsed in steed of salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the king, then that hee feared least some one constrained by famine, should deliuer or betray the Citie vnto the enemy. For which cause hee euerie day walked the round round about the walles, and visited the Sentinels of the citie, for feare least any one should lie hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gaue order, that if any one had such a sinister intent, the meanes to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certaine woman cried out vnto him, Haue mercie vpon me, O King; he incensed with wrath, and supposing that shee asked him some meat, beganne to raile on her, telling her that hee had neither graunge nor presse whereby he might any waies supply her necessity.

The woman answered him, that she had no need thereof, and that shee was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: Whereupon he commaunded her to expresse and declare what shee required. Hereupon she said, that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbor and friend, that shee famine and scarcitie was such, as they could find no redresse for the same; that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another euery day.
As for my selfe (said she) I haue first of all strangled mine, and we haue both of vs yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt vs, and concealeth her child. Ioram was grieuouly tormented to heare these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, hee deuiled in his hart to put him to death, because he praised not vnto God to grant him meanes to escape those euils that inuiroined them round about: so that hee sent a man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himselfe with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house, he told them that Ioram the murderers son sent a man to take away his head: but (said he) when as he that hath the matter in charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend and stay at the gate; for the king will follow him, and will resort to me in his owne person, hauing altered his resolution: & they according as they were commanded, shut him out of the doores whom the king had sent. Ioram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceived against the prophet, & fearing least he that had the commission to murder him should speedily execute the same, hastened himselfe all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and saue Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, for that he had not besought God to deliuer them from those many euils which they suffered; considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnesse, they were miserable consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day (about the same houre that the king came vnto him) that he should haue so great abundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicke, and a measure of flower for a sicke.

By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, & made no difficultie to beleeue the prophet, because that before time they had bene ascertained by their experience of the truth of his prophecies; and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessitie & miserie of the present was more patiently endured. But a certaine friend of the kings, and the gouernour of the third part of his armie (on whose shoulder the king at that time hapned familiarily to leane) spake vnto him after this manner: Prophet, thou tellest vs incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine downe heapes of barley & floure from heauen, so cannot that which thou speakest come to passe. To whom the Prophet replied: Thou thy selfe (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt partake no part thereof. Which prediction of his had a most certaine effect, according as hereafter it appeareth.

It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie should liue without the Citie walls, for feare least their conuersation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreame famine that rained within the Citie) they receiued no reliefe or sustenance out of the same, and whether they had licence to returne into the Citie, or whether they contained the-selves in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine; decreed amongst themselves to submit themselves to the enemies mercie, to the end that if they spared them, they might liue; and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with lesse torture. Now hauing resol-ued vpon this deliberation amongst themselves, they repaired by night vnto the enemies campe.
At that time God began to terrifie and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their cares with a noise of chariots and armes, as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspicious, and were so moued, that they forsooke their tents, and ranne vnto Adad, & told him that Ioram King of the Israelites had entertained the king of Egypt, and the king of the Hies for his confederates, whom he led out against them, & how already they had heard the noise of them that ap-proched to bid them the battell. Adad (whose cares were filled with no lesse rumor then those of the people)

people) was amazed and amazed at their sayings: so that all of them abandoned their campe, their horses, beasts of cariage, and riches, and betooke them to flight with disorder & confusion.
Those lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies campe (and of whom wee haue heretofore made some mention) being neer vnto the camp, perceived that there was great silence in the same, and no lesse abundance of all things: for which cause approaching the same, and entering into a tent, they found no body therein: for which cause they fell to eating & drinking, and that done to beare away a quantity of rayment, and gold which they hid without the camp.
Afterward resorting to an other tent, they bare away likewise that which was therein, & did the like by foure others without any encounter or contradiction of any man: & coniecturing thereby that the enemies were rettyred, they began to accuse themselves, because they had not giuen notice thereof to Ioram and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cause drawing neere vnto the walles of the Citie, they cried out vnto the watch, giuing them to vnderstand in what state they had found the enemies campe, who signified no lesse to Iorams guard, so that at last it came vnto his eares. Whereupon he presently sent for his friends and captaines, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him suspect some stratagem or ambush: for they (said hee) hauing lost their hope to surpris vs by famine, are retired vnder an intent, that when wee shall issue and fall a spoiling of their campe, they may come vpon vs, and kill vs; and afterwards take our citie without any stroke strooken. For which cause (said he) I aduise you to keepe good guard within the Citie, and let this retreat of our enemies make vs the more considerate. Some one of his councell praised this aduise of his, and allowed his foresight, aduising him to send out two scouts vpon horseback, to search euery quarter betwixt that and Iordan, to the end that if they should be taken and slaine by the enemies ambushment, their fall might bee a president to the whole army to stand vpon their guard (for feare least they should be surprisid in like manner:) vrging this for a conclusion, that the losse of two horsemen should not bee very great, since perhaps they might otherwaies haue been cut off by famine. This aduise of his was allowed by the king, and ratified by his assistants: so that presently there were two spies sent out, who rode along without encountering any enemy; but they met with great quantitie of victuals, and armes cast away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flee away the more lightly. Which when the king vnderstood, hee suffered the people to issue out, and spoile the campe, who recouered things of no small valew therein, but much gold and silver, and troupes of all sorts of cattell: and besides that, they found so great a quantitie of wheate & barley, that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they deliuered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was so great quantitie of corne, that two measures of barley were sold but for one sicke, and a measure of wheate flower for a sicke; according as Elizeus had prophesied. Now the measure which we call Sar containeth an Italian bushell and the halfe. But the captaine of the third part of the army, was he only that enioyed no part of this benefit: for being appointed by the king to haue the keeping of the gate, & to restraine the multitude from headlong preising out, for feare least thrusting one another, some of them should be troden vnder foote & slaine, he himselfe was troden vpon and slaine (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he only amongst the rest, would not giue credit to that which hee had said, as touching the great abundance of victuals that should hapen.

When Adad king of the Syrians was safely returned to Damasco, and knew that God had suffered such a confusion and feare to fall both on him and his army, and that it had not hapned by reason that the enemy sallied out vpon him; hee was sore discouraged to see that God was so displeased with him, and through anguish and agonie of minde fell sicke: And for that (at that verie time) Elizeus was come into Damasco; Adad vnderstanding thereof, sent Axael (who was one of his most trustie seruants) vnto him to present him, and consult with him vpon his sickness, whether he should recouer or no.

Hereupon Axael loaded forthie camels with the most fairest and most honourablest presents, that either Damasco, or the princes royall court affoorded; and repairing to Elizeus, saluted him verie courteously, telling him that hee was sent vnto him by king Adad, first of all to present him, and afterwards to aske counsaile of him as touching his malady, whether hee might easily be healed. The Prophet commanding the messenger to carry no euill tidings vnto the king, did notwithstanding tell him that he should die. Axael hearing thereof was sore grieued, and El-izeus himselfe began to weepe, so that the teares fell from his eies abundantly, in that he foresaw how many euils the people should suffer after the decaie of Adad. And when as Axael demanded him the cause wherefore he was so discomfited; I weepe (said he) for the compasion that I

haue of the people of Israel, by reason of those calamities which they shall indure by thy means. For thou shalt kill the better sort of them, and shalt burne their strongest Cities: thou shalt murder their infants, and dash them against the stones, and shalt open the womens wombes that are with childe. Azael answered, what force is there in me to execute these things? Elizeus said vnto him, that God had certified him that hee should bee king of Syria. When Azael was returned back vnto Adad, he signified nothing vnto him but glad tidings, as touching his sickness: but the next day hee cast a wet net vpon him and strangled him, and seized the kingdome into his owne hands. This Prince was a man of execution, and well beloued among the Syrians, and common people of Damafco, who euen vntill this day honour Adad and Azael his succesor as gods, by reason of their benefits and those temples which were builded by them, which adorne the Citie of Damafco. For every day doe they celebrate feasts in memory of these kings, and honour of them, by reason of their antiquitie, not knowing that they were moderne, and such as reigned not pasteleuen hundred yeeres since. But Ioram king of Israel hearing of the death of Adad, began to giue ouer his feare, and cast off that suspition which he had conceived of him, reioycing that yet at last he might haue libertie to liue in peace. The other Ioram king of Ierusalem (for he likewise was so called, as we haue heretofore declared) by murdering of his brethren & his fathers friends, who were gouernours, obtained the kingdome, and became so wicked & impious, as he differed in nothing from the kings of Israel, who transgressed the first lawes and ordinances of the Hebrewes, and peruered the seruice of God. For Athalia Achab daughter his wife taught him to execute diuers mischiefs, & amongst the rest to adore strange gods. This notwithstanding God would not altogether abolish his race, by reason of his promise made vnto Dauid: yet intermitted hee not daily to introduce new impieties; and soile the ancient lawes of his forefathers with new corruptions. Meane while; it came to passe that the Idumæans reuolted and slue their king, who had bene before time subiect vnto Iosaphat Ioram father, and in his place established an other to their owne liking. For which cause Ioram inuaded Idumæa by night with his horses and chariots, and spoiled the countrey round about his kingdome, without passing any farther: yet profited hee nothing in so doing; for all of them reuolted from him, and amongst the rest the inhabitants of the countrey of Libana.

But so great was the furie of this man, that hee constrained the people to ascend the high mountaines, and adore strange gods. Yet whilst hee behaued himselfe in this manner, and utterly rooted out of his thought the lawes of his forefathers, there was a letter brought vnto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified him that God would doe great iustice vpon him, because hee had forsaken the waies of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the kings of Israel, constraining the Tribe of Iuda and the inhabitants of Ierusalem to forsake the pure seruice of their God to serue Idols, as Achab had constrained the Israelites to doe: Furthermore, because hee had murdered his brethren, and slaine vpriight and vertuous men. The Prophet likewise certified him by letters, what punishment hee should endure, namely the ruine of his people, the death of his wiues and children, and lastly his owne death: which should happen vnto him by a sickness in his belly, wherewith hee should bee so tormented, that his entrailles strangely rotting within him, should drop out of his belly, & that he himselfe should see his misery, which should be such as neither might bee recovered by medicine, or should cure him vntill hee had finished his daies. These things did Elias denounce vnto him by his letters.

CHAP. III.

Iorams armie is discomfited, his sonnes are slaine, except one: and himselfe finally dieth a miserable death.

Not long after, the Arabian armie, that dwel towards Ethiopia, confederating themselves with other Barbarians, invaded Iorams countrey, and spoiled the same, and ransacked the kings house, and slew his sons and daughters, and left him but one onely sonne called Ochozias, who escaped fro his enemies hands. After this aduersitie, he himselfe was sicke with a long sickness, according as the Prophet had foretold him; for God poured his displeasure vpon his entrailles: whereupon he died miserably, seeing them fall out of his belly. The people likewise handled his bodie ignominiously, supposing as I thinke, that becing curd in that sort by Gods

A displeasure, hee was vnworthie of royall funerall, for hee was not buried in the sepulcher of the kings, neither was there any honour done vnto him. Hee liued fortie yeares, and reigned eight: and they of Ierusalem made his sonne Ochozias king.

CHAP. IIIII.

The King of Damasco warreth against the king of Israel.

*B*oram king of Israel, hoping after the death of Adad to recouer Ramath in Galaad fro the Assyrians, after he had made greater preparation & apparation for the war, hee led his army against the same. In this siege he was hurt by an arrow which was shor by a certaine Syrian, but not vnto the death, & retired himselfe into the Citie of Iezrael vntill he were recovered of his wounds (leauing behind him his whole army at the siege of Ramath vnder the conduct of Iehu the sonne of Nimshi, who tooke the Citie by force) intending vpon his recouerie to make warre against the Syrians. But the Prophet Elizeus sent one of his disciples to Ramath, and gaue him the holy oyle, and willed him to annoint Iehu, and to say vnto him that God had chosen and annointed him for king: and after he had informed him likewise in certaine other instructions, he commanded him to depart after the manner of one that flieth, making no man priue of his departurer. When this disciple of his came vnto the appointed citie, hee found Iehu sitting in the midst of the captaines at war (according as Elizeus had told him) & drawing neere vnto him, he told him that he would communicate certaine secrets with him, for which cause he arose and followed him into his chamber. Whereupon the yong man taking out the oyle poured it on his head, saying, that God had chosen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and reuenge the blood of the Prophets vniuistly murdered by Iezabel: and that both he and his house might bee brought to nought in like sort, as the sonnes of Ieroboam the sonne of Nabat, & the children of Basa were extinguished for their impietie; so that no one of the race of Achab might suruiue in the world. As soone as he had spoken thus, he issued out of the chamber with all speed, endeavouring that hee might not be discovered by any of the army. Now when as Iehu was come out, he returned to his place where he sate with the captaines, who demanded of him, and besought him to declare vnto them, wherefore the yong man came vnto him (alleging that they supposed him to be out of his wits.) Truly (said he) you haue diuined well: for he hath talked vnto mee after the manner of a mad man: wherein (they desirous to vnderstand wherefore he came, & beseeching him to expresse the cause) he told them what he had said vnto him, namely, how God had chosen him to be king over the people.

As soon as he had spoken these words, euery one of them cast off their garments & spred them before him, and founding a trumper, they proclaimed Iehu king; who assembling his army, determined to conduct them toward the Citie of Iezrael against Ioram (who lay there to recouer his wound which he had receiued at the siege of Ramath in Galaad, as we haue heretofore declared.) Thither also was resorted in the way of friendship and consanguinitie, Ochozias king of Ierusalem, both to visit Ioram, and to see how hee was recovered of his wound: for he was his nephew and sonne vnto his sister, as we haue said before. Iehu desirous to surprise Ioram and his followers on the sodaine, made an ordinance, by which he prohibited that none of the souldiers should runne before to giue any intelligence of his repaire vnto Ioram; alleging that it should be a manifest demonstration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwise, they that did otherwile, declared that they held him not for their king.

CHAP. V.

Ioram with all his race is slaine by Iehu: Ochozias king of Ierusalem is likewise slaine with him.

THe men of war were very ioyfull to execute this his ordinance, and garded the waies, to the intent that no man might secretly steale into Iezrael, and beare tidings to the inhabitants of that which had hapned. Meane while, Iehu attended by certaine of his choicest horsemen, and mounted in his owne person vpon a chariot, marched towards Iezrael. And when as he drew neere vnto the Citie, the sentinell that was appointed by Ioram to discover those that repaired to the Citie, perceived Iehu resorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Ioram that a troupe of horsemen were at hand. Whereupon a scout was sent out to discover who had sent, trouped along with the that came, & followed their generall. Whereupon the king sent out a messenger the second time; & Iehu commanded him to attend him as he did the first: which the sentinell signified to Ioram likewise, who finally mounted his chariot to go out to meet them, accompanied with Ochozias king of Ierusalem, who (as we haue said) was come into the citie, to see how the king recovered vpon his hurt, because he was neerely allied vnto him. But Iehu marched on softly & in goodly array, till Ioram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did? Who in steed of answere, reuiled him bitterly, & called him the son of a poiso-ner & of a harlot. For which cause Ioram (fearing his turbulent spirit, & suspecting least he hamme-ned vpon some sinister intent) turned his back, & fled away as swiftly as his chariot could bee driuen; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprisid by treason: but Iehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Ioram instantly fell vpon his knees, & died. Hereupon Iehu commanded Badac (who gouerned the third part of his army) to cast Ioram's body into Naboth's field, remēbring him of the prophecy of *Elia*s foretold by him to Achab, who murdered Naboth: namely, that he & his race should die in that field. For sitting behind Achab's chariot, he heard these words pronounced by the prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophesied. When Ioram was fallen downe, Ochozias was affraid to be slaine: for which cause he turned his chariot to take another way, hoping that Iehu would not discouer him. But he was purried and ouertaken in a certaine steepy way, & was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forooke his chariot, & being mounted vpon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had been searched & dressed some few daies, he deceased, and was caried to Ierusalem and buried there, after he had reigned one yeere, and surpassed his father in wickednes.

Iehu reigneth over Israel, and keepeth his court in Samaria; and after him his progeny, to the fourth generation.

AT such time as Iehu arrived at Iezrael, Iezabel being on the top of a tower in her princely robes, cried out: O trustie servant (said she) that hath slaine his master! Hee looking vpward, asked her what she was, commanding her to come downe vnto him: at length he charged her Eunuches to cast her downe from the top of the tower; who in her falling be- bloudied the wailes: and no sooner fell she vpon the ground, but that her body was trampled vnder the horses feet, vntill she died. That done, Iehu repaired to the palace with his friends; and reposed himselfe therein, commanding his seruants that they should bury Iezabel (in respect of the royall race from whence she was descended) but they to whom the charge of the obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was deuoured by dogs. Iehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecie of Elias, who had foretold that Iezabel should die in that sort in Iezrael.

4. Reg. 10.

Now in that Achabs Leuiticall Iohnes were brought vp in Samaria, Iehu sent two letters, the one vnto the masters of the infants, the other to the gouernours of the Citie, giuing them to vnderstand, that they should chooe one of the most vertuous amongst Achabs children, to raise as king ouer them, because they had a multitude of strong chariots, horses, armor, men, & (strong Cities); to the end that in so doing, they might take reuenge on those that slew their Lord and master. (This did hee vnder a colour to sound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the gouernours and tutors had receiued these letters, they were affraid, and made account that they could preuaile nothing against him, who had preuailed already against two mighty kings. For which cause they wrote backe vnto him, acknowledging him for their soueraigne; and offering themselves in all dutie, to be vnder his subiection. Whereupon Iehu sent backe vnto them againe, commanding them, that (to expresse their obedience) they should send him the heads of Achabs children, diuided from their shoulders. Which command of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed vp the heads in panniers, and sent them vnto him to Iezrael. As soon as they were brought thither, tidings thereof was carried to Iehu, as he sat at supper with his friends, who commanded that they should be laid in two heapes, at the citie gates on either side thereof. Which done, he issued out as soone as it was day, to see them; and beholding them, he

A began to tell those that accompanied him, that hee had voluntarily armed himselfe against his master, and flew him: but as touching those whom they saw there, hee had no waies laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men should know, that al that which hapned vnto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God; and that his house was destroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had slaine and dispatched both these and all those that were found to be of Achabs race amongst the Israelites, hee went vnto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochezias houshold seruants (who was king of Ierusalem) he asked the whether they went? who answered him, that they went to salute Ioram and their king Ochozias (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them slaine.) Hereupon Iehu commanded his seruants to lay hands on them, and put them to the sword, notwithstanding they were fortie two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Ionadab (who in times past had been his ancient friend, who embracing him, praised his forwardnes, in that hee had performed all things according to the will of God, in abolishing Achabs house. Iehu caused him to mount vp with him in his chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him that he should well perceiue, that hee would spare no one wicked man, but would punish all the false Prophets, and tellers of lies, and abusers of the people, who had made them forsake the true seruice of God, and adore strange gods: because the most laudable and allowed spectacle that might encounter a good mans eye, was to see the punishment of the wicked. Ionadab perswaded by these words, mounted vp into his chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Iehu had sought out Achabs kinred, he put them to death: and intending that no one of his false prophets and priests should escape his hands, hee assembled them together by a subtil policy. For gathering the people together, hee protested that hee would haue twise as many gods as Achab had had: willing that all the priests & ministers that belonged vnto them, should present themselves, for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent sacrifices to Achabs gods; protesting that whatsoever Priest should bee absent, hee should lose his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Having in this sort assigned a day wherein he would offer sacrifice, he sent thorow all the country of Israel, charging al Baals priests to repaire vnto him, & commanding that each of them might haue their vestments giuen them. As soone as they were apparelled, he resorted to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Ionadab, and commanded that a search should be made amongst them; to espie whether any one of contrary quality or condicon were medled with the; for that he intended that no stranger should be amongst the priests. When as therefore hee vnderstood that none but the priests were in that assembly, euen at such time as they begun to offer sacrifice, hee caused them to bee inclosed by fourescore souldiers (whom he esteemed to be most trustie) whom he commanded to kill the false prophets, and to punish them according to the custome of their forefathers, which had alreadie too long time been neglected; dreadfully threatening all those, who should any waies intermit to roore out the name and memorie of these wretches out of the world. They therefore slew all these priests, and inuironed the kings palace; and in so doing, cleered Samaria of forraigne gods. This Baal was the God of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the king of the Tyrians & Sidonians) to whom hee assigned priests, and honoured him with all sorts of sacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Iehu suffered the Israelites to adore golden calves. When this execution was performed in punishing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Iehu by his Prophet, that his children should obtaine the kingdome of Israel to the fourth generation. This was Iehues estate.

About the seuenth yeere, Ioiada entred into discourse with five centurions, and perswaded them to oppose themselves with mutuall consent against Athalias proceedings, and to assure the kingdome to little Ios. Whereupon giuing and receiuing faithfull promises of secrecie the one vnto the other, they confidently addressed themselves to execute their intended purposes, after this maner: They whom the hic priest had chosen to execute this act, went thorow all the country, and gathered the Priests and Leuites together, with all the gouernours of the tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Ierusalem to the hic priest, who made them swear an oth, that they would keepe secret that which he should enforme them of, as a thing that required silence, and men of execution to perform the same. As soone as he had assured them by oth, he brought forth the little child whom he had nourished (who was of Dauids line) and said vnto them: Behold your king, who is of that race which (as you know) was chosen by God to raigne ouer you for euer: I therefore thinke it fit that the third part of you guard and keepe him within the temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the same. An other company shal haue the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the palace: As for the rest of the people, let them remaine disarmed within the temple, and suffer no armed man to enter thereinto, except the priest onely. Hee appointed also an other company of priests and Leuites to bee about the king, with iuelins, and drawne swords, charging them that whosoever durst bee so bold to enter the temple armed, they should presently put him to the sword; and laying all feare aside, to attend the safety and guard of the kings person. They being obedient to that which the hic priest had commanded them, in effect expressed their readinesse: whereupon Ioiada opening the Arceall, (which in times past was prepared by Dauid) distributed amongst the centurions, Leuites and Priests, all the iuelins, quiuers, and all other sorts of armes that were therein, and disposed all them that were armed, round about the people, ioyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entering in amongst them that were not of their faction. Afterwards bringing out the infant Ios into the midst of the company, they set the royall crowne on his head, and Ioiada after he had anointed him with oyle, proclaimed him king: whereupon all the people reioiced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God saue the King.

Athalias punishment.

Athalia hearing this noise and applause, beyond all hope, was greatly troubled, and with those souldiers which she had about her, she hastily issued out of the palace, and arriuing in the temple the priests admitted her: as for the rest of the men of warre that followed her, they that by the hic priests ordinance circuted the temple, would not suffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia saw the child standing before the Tabernacle with the royall crowne on his head, she rent her garments, and storming thorow despite, she cried out and commanded that the traitor should be slaine, that had thus betrayed her and sought to dispossesse her of her kingdome. But Ioiada called the centurions, and commanded them to carie Athalia out vnto the brooke Cedron, and there to kill her (because he would not permit that the temple should be defiled with her curied blood.) Moreouer he charged them, that if any one should attempt to rescue her, they should kill them likewise. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) tooke her, and led her without the gate of the kings mules, and there slew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Ioiada assembled the people and the men of warre in the temple, binding them all by an oth, to yeeld the king their faithfull seruice, and to procure the prosperity, and increafe of his kingdome. Secondly, he made the king swear in like maner, that he would maintaine the seruice of God, and in no manner disannull Moses lawes. That done, they ranne vnto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Ioram had built to the dishonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and leuelled it with the ground, and put to death their high priest called Mathan. The charge and guard of the temple, Ioiada committed to the Priests and Leuites, according to the order establisht by Dauid, with commaundement twice a day to offer their ordinarie burnt offerings, & consequently to make perfumes according to the lawe. He appointed also certaine of the Leuites to bee porters to guard the temple, to the intent that no vncleane thing should enter the same vnepied: and after hee had ordained these things with the Centurions and gouernours and with all the people, he tooke Ios & led him out of the temple, and attended him to the palace, and hauing placed him in his royall throane, all the people cried, God saue the king, & banquetted & feasted for diuers daies. Thus after the death of Athalia the citie was in quiet. Ios was 7. yeeres old at such time as he was made king, his mother was called Sabia, & was of the towne Bersabee. BUT Azael king of Syria making war against the Israelites, & against their king Iehu, destroyed the country on the other side of Iordan, and all the easterne tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manasites. Furthermore, he burnt and spoiled Galaad, and Bathanaz, violenting and outraging all those that hee met withall. For Iehu went not out against him to resist him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a despiser of pietie, and his lawes) he died after he had reigned seauen and twenty yeeres ouer the Israelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Ios his sonne to succeed him in the kingdome. But Ios King of Ierusalem conceived a certaine desire to renewe the Temple: for which cause, calling vnto him Ioiada the high Priest, he commanded him to send thorow all the country the Leuites and Priests, and to leue vpon euery one of their heads halfe a sicle of siluer for the building and reparation of the Temple, which was fallen into decay in Ioram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the high Priest would not obey him heerein, knowing well that no man would willingly disburse mony. But in the three and twentieth yeere of his raigne, the king sent both for Ioiada, & the Leuites also, and expostulated with them for disobeying his commaundement, enioyning the from that time forth to provide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the high Priest vsed present dispatch in leuying the money, wherewith the people were highly contented. Hee therefore made a chest of wood closed on euery side (except that on the vpper lidde therof, there was a little craniclest open) which he placed neer vnto the Altar, commaunding that euery one should offer according to his deuotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranney into the coffer, to be employed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people shewed themselves affectionate: so that they gathered together a great quantitie of gold and siluer, with great zeale; and when the coffer was filled it was emptied, and the account thereof taken and sumd vp by the Secretarie, and high Priest in the kings presence, & afterwards all was brought together into one assigned place: which order was obserued euery day. And when as it was supposed that there was sufficient money gathered, the high Priest Ioiada and King Ios hired masons, & carpenters, & prepared great beames of excellent timber.

The restoring of the temple.

After that the temple was repaired, they imploied the remainder of gold and siluer (vvhich was of no small quantitie) to make cups, pots, and vessels, and other vtenils: and euery day offered they sacrifice of great value vpon the Altar, and this custome was continued so long as Ioiada liued. But after his decease (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth yeere of his age, after hee had liued a iust and vpright life, & was interred in the sepulcher of Dauid in Ierusalem, because hee had established the kingdom in Dauids posteritie) king Ios had no more care to serue God, and with him the rest of the Gouernours of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the lawes and ordinances, which they knew were very conuenient for them. For which cause, God being prouoked by this change, and incensed against the king and the rest, sent his Prophets vnto them, to protest, to expostulate with them for their offences, & to withdraw them from their iniquitie. But they pursued sin the more vehemently; so that neither the punishments, by which they, who had offended GOD before times, had been plagued, with all their posterities; neither all the aduertisements giuen them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend, or to forsake those finnes wherein they were engaged: but that which is worst; king Ios stoned Zachary Ioiadas son, and put him to death in the temple, forgetting himselfe most vngratefully of the benefits hee had receiued by his father. And the occasion was, for that Zachary hauing receiued a charge frō God to prophecy, came into the midst of the people, & counselled both them & him to follow iustice, foretelling the that they should be grievously punished, except they did belieue. This Zachary did at his death cal God to witnes & iudge of those calamities he endured, in dying grievously & violently for the good counsell which he had giuen the, & the benefits which his father had in times past done vnto Ios. But many daies passed not before the king suffered due punishment for these misdeeds.

The Syrian pacified with such & so great riches, & abundant treasure, suffered not his army to passe to Ierusalem. The forces of Israel weakened by God.

The yeere of the world 3109, before Christ's birth 855.

Amasias his sonne succeeded him in the kingdom. But in the 21 yeere of Ioas raigne, Ioachas, the sonne of Iehu, tooke possession of the kingdom of Israel in Samaria, & was seized thereof for the space of seuenteen yeeres. But he followed not his fathers steps, but rather behauing himselfe impiously, according as his predecessors in the kingdom, and contemners of God had done: For which cause the king of Syria subdued him, & cut off a great part of his dominions, and tooke his greatest cities from him, & defeated his armies: I so that at length he had but ten thousand footmen, and fise hundred horsemen. All which happened to the Israelites (according to the prophetic of Elizeus, which he foretold vnto Azrael at such time as he prophced vnto him, that he should raigne ouer the Syrians, and them of Damasco, after that he had murdered his maister. Ioachas beeing in this extremitie, had his recourse to God in prayer and supplication, beseeching him that it might please him to deliuer him fro the hands of Azrael, and not to suffer him to be vnder subiection and thraldome vnto him.

God (that respecteth the repentant, as if they had been innocent, & that gently checketh those whom he might utterly exterminate, if he so pleased) gaue him assurance against this war & danger, so that the country (hauing obtained peace) recovered presently her former estate and prosperitie. When Ioachas was dead, his sonne succeeded him in the gouernment, & began to raigne K ouer the Israelites in Samaria, in the 37 yeere of Ioas king of Iuda. (For this king of Israel was called Ioas, as well as he that rained in Ierusalem) he gouerned the kingdom sixteen yeeres. Hee was a good man, and had no correspondence with his father in disposition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell sick: to him resorted the king of Israel to visit him, and finding him in the extremitie, and past hope of recouerie, hee began to weepe and lament himselfe, calling him his father, and his armour, because that during his life, he had neuer occasion to vse the sword against the enemy; but that by meanes of his predictions, he had alwaies the vpper hand of them without stroke striking: that now he departed this life, and left him disarmed to the mercie of the Syrians, and other his enemies; so that hee had neither securitie of libertie, nor life, but that he rather wished to die with him, then to liue in those dangers.

Elizeus beeing mouued with these complaints, comforted the king that lamented in this sort, and commanding him to draw his boaw that hee had brought with him (for the king had bent the same) Elizeus said vnto him, Draw: and hee shot three arrowes, & gaue ouer at the fourth. Oh said Elizeus, if thou hadst shot more arrowes, thou hadst utterly ruinated the kingdom of the Syrians: and sith thou hast contented thy selfe with three shoots onely, thou shalt overthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou shalt fight against them, and shalt recouer the country they haue taken from thy father. After the king vnderstood these things he departed, and not long after the prophet died (who was renowned for his iustice, and manifestlie beloued of GOD, who shewed miraculous and incredible works by his prophecies, and such and so woorthie as the Hebrewes ought to keepe them in perpetuall remembrance) and was buried magnificentlie (according as it behooued a man, who was so highly fauoured by God as himselfe.)

It chanced about that time, that certaine thieues hauing cast the body of a man that was murdered by the vpon the body of the prophet where he lay buried, the dead body returned to life. This is all that we haue to speake as touching Elizeus, both in respect of his prophecies during his life time, as of that which hapned after his death, in witness of his diuine power. After the death of Azrael king of Syria, Adad his sonne obtained the kingdom, against whom Ioas king of Israel made

CHAP. X.

Amasias making warre against Ioas king of Israel, is overcome.

In the tenth yeere of the raigne of Ioas king of Israel, Amasias rained ouer the Tribe of Iuda in Ierusalem: his mother was called Iudan, & was a citizen of Ierusalem. He was wondrously carefull to maintaine iustice (notwithstanding he was very young.) And hauing taken vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom, hee resolved with himselfe, that he ought first of all to reuenge the death of his father Ioas, who was traiterously slaine by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them all to the sword (yet extended he not his displeasure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the lawes of Moses; vvhich saith, that it is not lawfull to punish the children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards leuied an army of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, & chose the men that were in their flowring yeeres, and about twenty yeeres of age: the number of whom amounted to three hundred thousand men, whom he diuided into Centuries. Hee sent also to the king of Israel, and waged a hundred thousand of his armed men for a hundred talents of siluer, because hee intended to make war vpon the Amalechites, Idumaans, and Gabelites. Now whilst hee made this preparation; and was in a readines to vnder take this exploit; a certaine prophet couelled him to dismis the Israelites that hee had with him, because they had no pietie in them, signifying vnto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that warre, he should be overcome: and contrariwise, that he should haue the vpper hand ouer his enemies, if hee fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Heerupon the king was fore moued (because he had already paid the Israelites their vvages) but the prophet ceased not to exhort him to do that which was pleasant in Gods sight, who would giue him siluer in abundance. For this cause hee dismissed them, telling them that hee freely gaue them their pay; and hee with the forces of his kingdom marched our against those nations, and D fought with them, and overcame them, and slew tenne thousand of them, & took no lesse number of prisoners aloue (whom he afterwards caused to bee led to a high rocke that bounded vpon Arabia, and from thence cast them downe headlong) and from all these nations hee recovered a great bootie, and brought home much riches.

Whilst Amasias stood vpon these tearmes, the Israelites (that had taken wages of him, and were cashiered by him) conceived a displeasure against him, supposing themselves to be iniured by him, as if he had dismissed them for men of small resolution. For which cause they invaded his country, and spoiled it as farre as Bethfemer, and carried away a great quantitie of cattell, & slew three thousand men. This victory and prosperitie made Amasias proud, so that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof, and continued the honor of those gods which he brought E from the country of the Amalechites. For which cause a prophet came vnto him and said, that hee wondered that he should esteeme them for gods, who had so little auailed them who honoured them, and had deliuered them into his hands; so that diuers of them were put to death, & diuers led away prisoners, which they themselves had brought vnto Ierusalem, according to the custome of warre. These words moued the King vnto displeasure, so that hee commaunded the prophet to silence, threatening him to punish him, if he intermedled with his affaires any more. Who answered him, that he would no further vrge him; yet withall hee foreprophecied vnto him; that God would not suffer this his inuouation to rest unpunished. Anon after, Amasias (not able to keepe a moderation amidst his affluence & prosperitie: but waxing more insolent against almighty God, by whom he possessed the blessings he enioyed) in height of his pride wrote to Ioas king F of Israel, commanding him and his to yield him homage, according as in times past the Israelites were subiect to Dauid and Salomon; threatening him, that if he refused to doe him voluntarie seruice, he would enforce him to decide the different by armes: to whom the Israelite replied thus. King Ioas to King Amasias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres tree of great height, to whom a little thistle wrote, demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his son. ing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, least thorow thy presumption thou expose both thy life and fortune to the incertaine hazard of warre. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more whetted vnto warre (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore hee had drawne his army into the field, & both the armies were vpon the point to wage the battell, a sudden feare & discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias army turne their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceived) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Iosias threaten, that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Ierusalem to open their gates, and to receiue both him and his armie into the cittie, he would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessity and feare of death) wrought so much as his enemies were receiued into Ierusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; & there-thorow Amasias was led captiue into Ierusalem. In this manner was Iosias made master of the Cittie, who afterwards carried away the treasures of the temple, & tooke away the gold and siluer that Amasias had in his Palace: and hauing in this sort ransomed him from captiuitie, he returned backe againe into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the Cittie of Lachis, to auoid the conspiracie of his domesticall friends, by whom notwithstanding hee was surprised, and slaine by them that were sent to doe the deed: his body was brought and royally entombed in Ierusalem. Thus died Amasias for introducing innovations in contempt of God; he liued fiftie foure yeeres, and reigned twentie and nine: his sonne Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

How Ozias ouercame his neighbour Nations.

IN the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of Amasias, Ieroboam, Iosias son, began to raigne ouer the Israelites in Samaria, and enioyed the kingdome for the space of forty yeeres. This king dishonoured God, and offended him grievously in obseruance of Idols, & diuers absurd and strange actions, by which hee heaped ten thousand mischiefs and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certaine prophet called Ionas, who prophesied vnto him, that he should make war against the Syrians, and that he should ouercome them, and enlarge his kingdom to the Northward, as farre as the Cittie of Amatha; and to the Southward as far as the lake Alphalites (for these in times past were the limits of the country of Chanaan, according as the generall Iosuah had confined them.) Ieroboam encouraged by this propheticke, led forth his armie against the Syrians, & spoiled all their country (according to the propheticke of Ionas.) And for that I haue promised to yeeld an exact historie in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, me thinks it shal not be amiss to declare that, which I haue found written of this prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man (being commaunded by God to repaire vnto the kingdome of Ninus, & to proclaime that which should happen to the cittie of Niniue; namely, that the government thereof should be abolished) thorow feare which he conceived, repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a cittie called Ioppa; where finding a shippe, he entred the same, and sailed towards Tharsis in Cilicia. But there arose so vehement a tempest vpon the sea, that the vessell was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master, and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thanksgiving vnto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Ionas hid himselfe, & covered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waves incensed by violent windes, increased more and more; the mariners and passengers beganne to imagine amongst themselves, that some one of them in that Barke had caused that tempest: whereupon they agreed amongst themselves to cast lots, to knowe which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fell vpon Ionas: who being demaunded whence he was, and for what businesse he travelled: answered them, that he was an Hebrew by nation, and a Prophet of the most high God; and counsell'd them, that if they would be warrant'd from that danger, they should cast him into the sea, because it was he onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not performe that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impietie, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had been committed to their trust. But for that the storme more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they vnted very little of imminent shipwrack; and being besides that incited by Ionas himselfe, and whetted on likewise likewise by the feare they conceived, to lose their liues, they cast him into the sea: whereupon suddenly the storme ceased. It is likewise said, that being swallowed vp by a great fish (for the space of three daies and three nights) hee was at the last vomited out, and cast by the same fish vpon the shore of the Euxine sea aliue, and without any maime in any of his members. There be sought he GOD that he would pardon him the sinne which he had committed: and afterwards hee resorted to the Cittie of Niniue, where ascending a place from whence hee might be heard, hee published with a loud voice vnto them, that they should lose the Empire of Asia: which after hee had pronounced, he returned back againe. This recitall haue I made according as I haue found it registered in writing.

King Ieroboam hauing passed all his life time in prosperitie, and reigned for the space of fortie yeeres, departed this life, and was entombed in Samaria, and Zachary his sonne succeeded him in his kingdome. At the same time, Ozias the sonne of Amasias reigned in Ierusalem ouer the Ieroboams tribes, after that Ieroboam had already reigned foureteene yeeres; his mother was called Achia, and was of the Cittie of Ierusalem. He was a man of a good nature, & such a one as loued iustice, of noble courage, and very laborious in providing for all occurrences: he made warre against the Philistines, & after he had ouercome them in battell, he tooke Ita, and Amnia, two of their strong forts, and raced them. This exploit done, he set vpon the Arabians that neighbored vpon Egypt, and after that (hauing built a cittie vpon the red sea) he planted a garriſon therein. He afterwards discomfited the Ammonites, constraining them to pay him tribute, and subdued all as farre as the marches of Egypt. After that, he began to prouide for the city of Ierusalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the walles thereof, that had been beaten downe or decayed, either by continuance of time, or by the negligence of those kings who were his predecessors: he repaired those also which the King of Israel had beaten downe, at such time as hauing taken Amasias prisoner, hee rode in triumph into the Cittie. Besides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fiftie cubits hie. These inclosed he with walles to set garriſons therein, & in diuers barren places he caused diuers fountaine-heads to be made: for he had an infinite multitude of beasts of carriage and other cattell, in that the country was fit for pasture. He tooke pleasure also in tillage, for which cause he was often busied about his land, in trimming, sowing, and planting the same. Hee had about him a chosen army, to the number of three hundred and seauenty thousand fighting men, whose Generals, Conductors, and Captaines, were valiant and inuincible men, and were in number two thousand.

Hee taught his souldiers to march in a square battell (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with swords, targets, and corselets of brasſe, with arrowes and darts. Hee made also great preparation of diuers engines to batter Citties, and to shoote stons and darts, besides diuers hookes, and other such like instruments. But whilst hee was intent on these studies & preparations, he grew insolent and proud, and being puffed vp with mortall arrogance, he contemned the immortall force, which endureth for euer (which is pietie towards God, and the obseruation of his commandements.) For which cause he was ouerthrowne by his prosperitie, and fell into his fathers sinnes, thorow the happinesse and greatnesse of his estate, wherein he could not moderately containe himselfe. So that vpon a certaine solemne feast day wherein all the people were assembled together, hee attired himselfe in the high Priests vestments, and entred into the temple to offer sacrifice vnto God vpon the golden altar; which notwithstanding the high Priest Azarias (accompanied with fourescore Priests) inhibited him the same, telling him that it was not lawfull for him to sacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in those that were of the posteritie of the high Priest Aaron.

Whilst after this manner Azarias expostulated with him, commaunding him to goe out of the Temple; and not to contradict the ordinances of God; the king waxed wroth, and threatned to take his life from him, except he kept himselfe quiet. Whereupon there fell a great trembling and earthquake, and the temple clef in twaine, and a great light of the sunne entred thereinto, and reflected on the kings face in such manner, that all his body was instantly couered with a leprosie, and before the Cittie (in a place called Bergo) the halfe of a mountaine (that stood to the Eastward) brake and fell, and rowled and remoued for the space of foure stadia, towards the orientall mountaine, where it rested: so that the publike waies were shut vp, and choaked, and the kings gardens of pleasure were wholly ruined & disfigured. When the Priests beheld the kings face couered with a leprosie, they told him what inconuenient had hapned vnto him, and enioyned him to depart out of the towne, according to the custome of men that were polluted. Whereupon hee (wholly confused at so grievous an accident; and hauing no more audacitie to speake) obeyed

Afterwards being assailed by Phul king of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither practiced to resist him, but procured his peace for the sum of a thousand talents of siluer, which in way of composition hee paid vnto him. Iotham's piety

Iotham the sonne of Ozias raigned in Ierusalem ouer the tribe of Juda: hee was the sonne of a daughter of Ierusalem called Ierafa. There was no vertue deficient in this king, for hee was deuout towards God, iust towards men, & carefull to reparaire the Cittie: for he willingly imploied himselfe in restoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. Hee built galleries & porches about the Temple, and repaired the walls that were fallen downe: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he restored all that which was deficient in his kingdom. He made warre vpon the Ammonites; and ouercomming them in battell, he made all their nation tributarie, and constrained them to pay him yeerely a hundred talents, & ten thousand Cores of wheat, and as many of barley: and his kingdome in such sort increased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the same time there liued a certaine Prophet called Naum, who prophced the ouerthrow of the Assyrians, and of the Cittie of Niniue, and spake to this effect. All the people thereof shall be tossed and troubled, and be put to flight; and shall say the one vnto the other: Stay and abide, take gold and siluer, and there shall be none that will receiue it. For they shall haue more care to saue their bodies, then their goods: for there shall be a great debate amongst them with lamentation: their members shall lose their vigour, and their faces shall be altogether swart thorow feare: where shall the reparaire of the Lions be? or where shall the mother of Lions whelp reft her? Niniue (God saith vnto thee) I will destroy thee, neither shall the Lyons that issue from thee, gouerne the world any more. To this effect did he prophcie, and spake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeat. For I haue omitted it purposely, because I would not be troublesome to the Readers. But all those things which hee forespoke as touching Niniue, came to passe one hundred and fiftene yeeres after. But this is sufficient for the manifestation of this matter.

Rafin King of Damasco maketh warre against Ierusalem: Achaz sendeth for the King of Assyria to Assist him.

After that Iotham had liued one and fortie yeeres, and raigned fiftene, hee died, and was buried in the sepulchre of the kings: after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his sonne, who was a contemner of God, and a transgressour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himselfe to the customes of the Kings of Israel: for he erected Altars in the Citie of Ierusalem, and sacrificed vnto Idols, offering vp his owne sonne vnto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated diuerse such like offences. During these impious idolatries of his, Rafin King of Syria and Damasco, and Phaceias King of Israel made warre against him (for these two were confederates) leading therefore both their armies against Ierusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reason the wallles were verie strong. But the King of Syria hauing seized the Citie of Elath, nere vnto the red sea, and slaine all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garrisons likewise to the sword, and all the Iewes rounde about, and carried away with him a great bootie into Damasco, and afterwarde returned home with his armie. The King of Ierusalem vnderstanding that the Syrians were retyred, and supposing himselfe to be sufficient to fight against the King of Israel, ledde forth his forces against him, and was overcome in battell (because that God was incensed against him for his wickednesses, which were both detestable and infinite.) For in that battell the Israelites slue about sixscore thousand men: amongst whom was Zacharias the sonne of Achaz, whom the generall of the armie of the Israelites called Amias slue, with Ericam the gouernour of the whole Realme, and hee tooke Elcan the generall of the tribe of Juda prisoner also. At that time there was a certaine Prophet liuing in Samaria, whose name was Obel, who comming out to meete the armie, cried with a loud voice vnto the people, that the victorie which they had, did not happen vnto them thorow their valour, but by reason of the wrath of God conceived against Achaz king of Juda. He furthermore reproued them, for that not contenting themselves with the good hap of that victorie, they had so furre presumed as to hold them of Juda and Beniamin prisoners, who were of their owne alliance: he therefore counselled them to send them backe vnto their houses, without any iniurie by iniustice offered vnto them; threatening them, that if they did the contrary, they be might assured that God would punish them.

The word of God is never without fruit.

maſco, hee ſlew Raſes their king alſo, and transported them of Damaſco into the higher Media, and ſent certaine people of Aſſyria into Damaſco. Hee wrought much miſchiefe likewiſe in the countrey of Iſrael, and led away a great number of priſoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been ſubdued and weakned after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and ſiluer that was in the kings treaſury, and in the temple of God, and caried it vnto Damaſco, and gaue it to the king of Aſſyria, according to thoſe promiſes he had made him, and after much gratuity and thankſgiuing, he returned backe againe to Ieruſalem.

This King was ſo ſenſeleſſe and ignorant of his owne profit, that although he were ouerpreſſed by warre by the Syrians, yet cealed he not to adore their gods, but perſiſted in their honour, as if he expected the victory by their meanes. And although he were overcome againe, yet intended he the honor of the Aſſyrian gods; chooſing rather to reuerence any, then the true God, whom his forefathers worſhipped: Yea ſo farre grew he in contempt and neglect of all true pietie, that at length he ſhut vp the temple gates, and prohibited the ordinary ſacrifices, hauing before that taken all the precious preſents out of the ſame. After hee had in this ſort committed theſe outrages againſt God, he died, when he was thirty & ſix yeeres old; and after he had reigned ſixtene yeeres, and left his ſonne Ezechias to ſucceed him in the kingdom. At that very time died Phaceias King of the Iſraelites, by the meanes of a certaine conſpiracy, which Oſeas his intended friend, wrought againſt him: who held the kingdom for the ſpace of nine yeeres, ſhewing himſelfe both to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Againſt him Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria moued warre, and ouercame him becauſe God was not fauourable vnto him, neither aſſiſtant in his enterpriſes: hee was therefore ſubdued, and conſtrained to pay a certaine tribute impoſed vpon him. The fourth yeere of the raigne of Oſeas, Ezechias the ſonne of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Ieruſalem, reigned ouer the two tribes. He was a man of a virtuous diſpoſition, and one that loued iuſtice and pietie: for as ſoone as he came vnto the kingdom; hee reſolued with himſelfe firſt of all that the chieft and moſt neceſſary and moſt profitable thing that might bee, was the eſtabliſhment of the ſeruice of God. When as therefore he aſſembled the people, the Prieſts, and the Leuites, hee beganne to diſcoure and deuife with them, in theſe or ſuch like wordes. There is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irrecurent regard and ſeruice towards God, ye are fallen into many and mighty calamities, becauſe thorow your extreame madneſſe, you haue ſuffered your ſelues to be perſwaded to adore thoſe, whom hee eſteemed to be gods. Since therefore you haue learnt (to your owne miſery) how pernicious a thing impietie is, I exhort you, that (forgetting the ſame) you purifie both your ſelues, your Prieſts, and your Leuites from your former pollutions, that yet at length you may aſſemble together, and open the temple and cleaſe the ſame with ordinary ſacrifices, to the end it may be reſtored to the ancient honour which earſt it poſſeſſed: for by this meanes wee ſhall haue God fauourable vnto vs, when his wrath ſhall be appeaſed that was kindled againſt vs. As ſoon as the king had ſpoken after this manner; the Prieſts opened the temple, and after they had gathered the ſacred veſſels, and caſt all vnleaneſſe out of the ſame, they offered ſacrifice vpon the altar, according to the cuſtom. Afterwards the king ſent to all the prouinces vnder his dominion, and gathered together the people of Ieruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of vnleavened bread (which had been intermitted a long time thorow the impietie of the kings his predeceſſors.) He ſent alſo vnto the Iſraelites, exhorting them to forſake the cuſtoms which of long time they had wickedly obſerued, and to returne to the true and ancient manner of ſeruing God, certifying them that he would permit them to repaire to Ieruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of vnleavened bread, promiſing them that he himſelfe would ſolemnize the ſame with them alſo: proteſting that hee did this, not in reſpect of his owne profit, but thorow the deſire he had to further their felicitie, who ſhould bee happy if they obeyed this his counſaile.

When Ezechias embassadours came vnto the Iſraelites, and had deliuered vnto them the meſſage that they had in charge: ſo farre were they from conformity, that they mocked them, and eſteemed them to be mad, and ſpit vpon thoſe Prophets that exhorted them to piety, and foretold them the euils they ſhould ſuffer, vnleſſe they ſubſcribed to the ſeruice of God; and finally they layd hold on them, and put them to the ſword. And not contenting themſelues with this preſumption, they yet attempted ſurre worſer things; and neuer gaue ouer vntill that God (in puniſhment of their impietie) made them ſubiect vnder the hands of their enemies, as ſhall appeare manifeſtly hereafter. But diuers of the tribes of Manaſſes, Zabulen & Iſſachar (reſpecting the good counſailes of the Prophets) ſubmitted themſelues to the ſeruice of God, and repaired altogether to Ieruſalem to King Ezechias to honour God. As ſoone as they were arrived there,

Ezechias aſcended into the temple accompanied with the gouernours, and all the people, and offered there ſeuē bulles, ſeuē rammes, and as many goates: and after that he, and all the gouernours had laid their hands vpon the heads of the ſacrifice, they deliuered them to the Prieſt, according as it appertained to them, and they ſacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Leuites alſo (aſſiſting round about with instruments of Muſicke) ſung hymnes and ſongs vnto God, according as they had bene taught by the ordinance of Dauid. The other Prieſts had trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their hymnes. Which done, the King and all the people caſt themſelues proſtrate vpon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards ſacrificed ſeuētie oxen, a hundreth ſheepe, and two hundreth lambes. The King likewiſe beſtowed ſix hundreth oxen, and three thouſand ſheepe vpon the people to eaſt withall. And when as the Prieſts had ioiſfully performed all things (according to the cuſtome contained in the law) the King tooke great pleaſure and banquetted with the people, giuing thanks vnto God. And when the feaſt of vnleavened bread was come, they ſacrificed the Paſſeouer, and during the ſeuē other daies, they offered vp their other ſacrifices. The King gaue in way of gratuitie vnto the people (beſides that which had bene offered) two thouſand oxen, and ſeuē thouſand ſheepe. The gouernours did the like, and gaue the people a thouſand buls, and one thouſand foure hundreth ſheepe: and thus was the feaſt ſolemnized, which had bene ſo magnificently and devoutly celebrated ſince Salomons time. When the ſolemnitie of this feaſt was paſt, they iourneyed and went thorow the countrey, and purified it. They purged the Citie likewiſe of all vnleaneſſe of Idols, and the King ordained that the dayly ſacrifices ſhould be made according to the law, vpon his charge. Hee enacted alſo that the people ſhould pay the tents to the Prieſts, and Leuites, with the firſt fruites, to the intent they might wholly intend pietie, and neuer eſtrange themſelues from the ſeruice of God. By which meanes it came to paſſe, that the people brought all kinde of fruit to the prieſts, and Leuites: which the King put vp in certaine ſtorehouſes, which he had built, to be diſtributed to euerie one of them, their wiues, and children, and by this meanes they returned againe to their former puritie in religion. After the King had diſpoſed all things in this ſort, hee made warre vpon the Philiftines, and ouercame them, and ſeiſed all their Citie (betweene Gaza, and Geth). About this time the King of Aſſyria ſent vnto him, and threatened him, that if hee would not pay him thoſe tributes which his father before him had paide vnto him, he would deſtroy all his countrey. Neuertheleſſe Ezechias ſet light by his threats, aſſuring himſelfe in that pietie and zeale hee bore towards God, and in the Prophet Eſay, by whom he was exactly inſtructed as touching all thoſe things that were to ſucceede. And for this preſent it ſhall ſuffice that wee haue ſpoken thus much of this king.

CHAP. XIII.

Salmanaſar ſlayeth the King of Iſrael, and leadeth the Iſraelites captiue into the countrey of Media.

When tidings was brought to Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria, that the King of Iſrael had priuily ſent vnto Soan king of Egypt, to requeſt his aſſiſtance in warre againſt the Aſſyrian, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and drew forth his armie againſt Samaria, in the ſeuēth yeere of the raigne of Oſeas. But the King of Iſrael withſtoode his entrance into the Citie, by which meanes he was beſieged therein for three yeeres ſpace, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth yeere of Oſeas, and the ſeuēth of Ezechias raigne. At which time all the kingdom of Iſrael was deſtroyed, and all the people transported into the countrees of Media, and Perſia; and amongst the reſt King Oſeas was taken priſoner. The King of Aſſyria cauſed certaine Nations of a Countrey, which (by reaſon it abutted vpon a certaine riuer in Perſia called by that name) was called Chut, to remove their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabite the Countrey of Iſrael. As for the ten Tribes of Iſrael, they were transported out of their Countrey (nine hundreth ſortie ſeuē yeeres, ſince their predeceſſors (departing out of Egypt) poſſeſſed the Countrey of Chanaan; eight hundreth yeeres after the gouernment of Iofuah; and two hundreth and ſortie yeeres, ſeuē moneths, and ſeuē dayes, ſince they reuolted from Roboam Dauids nephew, to giue the kingdom to Ieroboam.) This was the end of the Iſraelites, who tranſgreſſed the lawes, and diſobeyed the prophets, who foretolde them of that calamitie which ſhould happen vnto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The ſedition that they moued againſt Roboam, eſtabliſhing his ſeruant for their King, was the originall of their miſchiefs. For Ieroboam committing impietie againſt God, and they imitating his wickedneſſe, preuailed ſo much, as the maieltie of God

God grew displeased with them, so that he punished them according as they deserved. But the King of Assyria ravaged and spoiled all Syria, & Phoenicia with his armie, & his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for he made warre against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulat reigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greeke tongue. The King Elulat (said he) reigned six and thirtie yeares, and pursued the Cutheans that were revolted from him by sea, and made them subiect. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his armie, and invaded all Phoenicia, and afterwarde hauing couenanted a peace with them, hee returned backe againe. The Cities of Sidon, Arce, and Paletyr, and diuerse other cities revolted from the Tyrians, & submitted themselves to the king of Assyria. For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, hee drew his armie forth once more against them; and hee was furnished by the Phoenicians with sixtie ships, and eight hundred rowers. The Tyrians charging these ships with twelue of their vessels, ouerthrew the naue of the Assyrians, and tooke about fise hundred men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the king of Assyria returning backe againe, planted a garrison vpon the riuier, and fortified the fountaine heades, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of fise yeares) they were enforced to find & dig new fountaines to sustaine themselves. These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselves, as also the exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chuteans & new inhabitants of Samaria (for to this day their name remaineth there, as hauing bin brought from the Region of Chut which is in Persia, where there is a Riuier of that name) for that they were of fise nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honoured in their nation, to the number of fise gods, whom they serued after the manner of their Countrey. Wherevpon the true and supreme God was grievously displeased, and prouoked against them: for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could finde no remedie, vntill such time as they had notice that it behooued them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safetie. They therefore sent vnto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in warre. Which done, they learning the law, and the manner of Gods seruice by them, began verie diligently to obserue both: by which meanes the plague ceased sodainly. And now euen vnto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrewes Chuteans, and Samaritanes by the Greekes. These as often as they find the Iewes in prosperitie, call them their cousins (according to the variety and changes of time) but if they perceiue their fortunes to bee on the declining hand, then abiure they consanguinitie, and renounce any lawfull parentage or amity, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawne thither from a forraigne nation. But in time and place conuenient, we shall speake of them more amply.

CHAP. I.

Senacharib King of Assyria besiegeth Ezechias in Ierusalem.

- B N the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacharib King of Assyria drewe forth a huge army against him, and surprised all the Cities of Iuda and Beniamin by strong hand. To him Ezechias sent Embassadours, promising him obedience, and such a tribute as it should please him to impose. When Senacharib had heard and considered vpon the embassadours instructions, he resolved on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promising that he would depart in peace as soone as hee had receiued three hundred talents of siluer, and thirty talents of gold: swearing an oth vnto the embassadours, that vnder these conditions he would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giuing credit to these wordes of his, emptied the treasures, and sent the prefixed summe to Senacharib, hoping to be deliuered from his enemy, and the hazard wherein his countrey stood. But the Assyrians hauing receiued the money, serlight by their promises, so that Senacharib went in person to make warre against the Aegyptians and Aethiopians, and left Rabfaces his generall in Iudæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeft minions and courtiers, with commision to spoyle Ierusalem: The names of these two were Tharata & Anachares. As soon as they were encamped neere vnto the walles, they sent vnto Ezechias and commaunded him to come and speake with them: but hee thorow feare which he had conceiued, went not vnto them, but sent three of his most familiar friends, Eliacim the superintendent of his realme, Sobna and Ioachus that had the commision of his registers. These three presented themselves before the chiefeftaines of the Assyrian army: whom when Rabfaces had beheld, he commaunded them to returne vnto their master, and to tell him that the great king Senacharib was desirous to know vnder what hope he thus neglected his government, & obstinately refused to obey him and receiue his army into the City? Is it perhaps, because he hopeth the Aegyptians will haue the vpper hand of the kings army? If that be his hope, doubtlesse he is deceiued, shewing himselfe to be like vnto a man that stayeth himselfe vpon a broken reede; by which hee is not onely not sustayned, but in his fall also, hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewise withheld him to conceiue, that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times past hath giuen them victorie ouer the Israelites; so now also is pleased to humble Ezechias, and to make both him and his subiects stoope vnder the Assyrian government. Whilest Rabfaces spake thus in the Hebrew language (wherein he was very skilfull) Eliacim (fearing least the multitude should be stricken with feare vpon the hearing of these wordes) besought him to speake in the Syriack toong. But he sufficiently instructed what it was that he feared, answered him with a lowder voice in the hebrewe toong, and tolde them that they ought to giue care vnto the Kings commaundement, and to yeelde themselves to his mercie, because it concerned their securitie. I am not ignorant (sayd he) that both you and your King do persvade the people vnder a vaine hope, and fraudulently allure them to beare armes against vs. But if your valour be ought at all, and you suppose that you can leuy the siege from your walles, I am ready to furnish you with two thousand horse, giue you vs so many horsemen to approue their valors: but you cannot giue them that you haue not. Why therefore delay you? why yeelde you not to those that are too strong for you? and are able euen in spite of your resist to ransack your city? whereas you know that a willing submission is alwaies secure: contrariwise whereas duety is enforced, there wanteth no perill of calamity.

When both the Embassadours and the people had heard that which the Assyrian had spoken, they reported the same to Ezechias, who incontinently cast his royal garments off, and clothed himselfe in sackcloth, carrying the countenance of a disconsolate man, and casting himselfe prostrate vpon the earth after the manner of their countrey, he besought God to be assistant vnto him, since all other hope was vaine. He sent also certaine of his friends, and some Priests vnto the Prophet Ezra, requiring him to pray vnto God, that since the sacrifice was offered vnto him for publicke securitie, it might please him to frustrate the enemies hopes, and to haue pitie and compasion on his people. When the Prophet had performed no lesse then he required, he receiued an answer from God, by which he assured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies should be ouercome without stroke strooken, & should retire with shame, and not with that aduantage which they bragd of at this present, because God had already determined how they should be ouerthrowne. Hee foreprophecied also that Zenacharib himselfe (the King of Assyria) should faile of his enterprise in Aegypt, and that vpon his return to his owne court, he should be slaine. At that very time the Assyrian wrote letters to Ezechias, in which he called him foole and mad man, to thinke that he could warrantize himselfe from being his slaue, yea his in especiall, who had conquered diuers and far greater nations: threatening him with vter ruine at such time as he should surpriseth the Citie, if hee opened not the gates of Ierusalem willingly, to entertaine his armie. When Ezechias had read these letters, he set light by them, by reason of the confidence he had in God: and hauing opened them, he spred them in the temple. And whilest he renewed his praiers vnto God for the saluation of the City, and his subiects, Esay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewise they should manure their lands in peace & securitie, & should enioy their possessions without feare. Not long after, the king of Assyria hauing but cold successe in his expedition against Aegypt, turned back againe without doing any thing, for this cause that ensueth. Hee had lost much time in the siege of Pelusium: & at such time as he had already raised certaine bulwarks as by as the wall, so that he wanted nothing but to giue the assault; news was brought him that Tharices king of Aethiopia brought an army to rescue the Aegyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the desert, and sodainly to charge the Assyrian armie. Senacharib troubled with these tidings, speedily departed thence with his army. But Herodotus saith, that he made waire with Vulcan priest, especially for that he was both a king and a priest: Besieging Pelusium (sayde hee) for this cause he gaue ouer the siege. The King of Aegypt called to his God for assistance, by whose power the Arabians suffered much miserie. But in this also he erreth, in that he setteth downe the Arabian for the Assyrian. In one night (sayd he) there was such a multitude of mice, that they gnaw all the enemies bowes and other arms: whence it came to passe that the King being disarmed withdrew his siege from Pelusium. But Berosus a writer among the Chaldees maketh mention of Senacharib, and how he reigned amongst the Assyrians, and troubled both Asia and Aegypt with warre, and declareth the manner in these words. But Senacharib returning from the Aegyptian warre came before Ierusalem, and receiued the army that was there, at the hands of his gouernour Rhabaze, and God caused a pestilent sicknesse to fall vpon his army, which was so violent that the first night of the siege there died one hundreth fourescore and fise thousand men, with their gouernors and chieftains. With which losse he was so affrighted, and troubled, that fearing to lose his army, he fled with those that remained, & retired himselfe into his kingdome to the Citie called Ninieue, where after he had liued for a time, he was traiterously slaine by Adramelech, and Selenar his two elder sons: and being dead, was caried into his owne temple called Aruche, and his children were driuen out of the kingdom for committing the murder, and retired themselves into Armenia, and Afferadochus succeeded Senacharib. Such was the end of the Assyrian army that came before Ierusalem.

Ezechias hauing for a time remained in peace, dieth: & leaueth his son Manasses to succeed him.

R King Ezechias (being in this sort beyond all hope deliuered fro his fears) offered thanksgiving & sacrifices vnto God, with all the people, acknowledging that there was no other cause that had slain part of his enemies, and put the rest to mortall feare, neither that had deliuered Ierusalem from thraldom, but only Gods succour and assistance. And whilst he altogether intended and was occupied about the seruice of God, he fell sicke of a grievous discale, so as the Physicians despaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This ticknes of his was accompanied with a grievous cure, because he had no children, and saw that he was now to depart the world, and to leaue his house desert, & his kingdom desolate. Being therefore in this sort toyled with discontents, he lamented and besought God, that it would please him to lengthen his life a little time, vntill he had children to succeed him, and that he would vouchsafe that his soule might not be taken from him, before hee were the father of a sonne.

A sonne. Herupon God taking compasion of him (and the rather, because he was not grieved for that the pleasures of his kingdome were taken from him; but for that he sought for a lawful heire to succeed him in the principedome) he sent the Prophet Esay vnto him, to assure him, that after three daies he should be recovered of his sicknesse: and that after he had liued some fifteen yeers more, he should depart out of this life, and leaue a lawfull heire behinde him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought these tidings to the king; he doubted both the vnexpected messenger, and the mightinesse of his discale: for which cause he required some prodigious signe at Esaias hands, to the intent that he might certainly beleue, that he was sent as a messenger from God vnto him: for the truth of those things, which either exceede our hope, or reason, are wont to be confirmed by these meanes. Whereupon Esay asked him what signe he required, and it should be giuen him. For which cause hee requested, that since the declining sun had already aduanced his shadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cause it to return vnto the place where it was before, and ouerrun againe the same lines of shadow. On this occasion the Prophet besought God, that it would please him to confirme the king by this miracle: who seeing that which he desired, was sodainly deliuered from his sicknesse, and ascended the temple to worship and praise God. At that time it hapned, that the monarchy of the Assyrians was destroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will speake in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon sent an Embassadour to Ezechias with presents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiuing his messengers, willingly feasted them, and shewed them his treasures, his arcanall, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious stones: and after he had giuen them presents for Balad, he dismissed them. Whereupon the Prophet Esay came vnto him, asking him from whence those Embassadours came? To whom Ezechias answered, that they were of Babylon, & came vnto him from the king, telling the Prophet how he had shewed them all that which he had, to the end that hauing seene and obserued his riches and power, they might afterwarde certifie their king thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, saying: Know thou that within a little time thy riches shall be transported into Babylon, and thy children shall be made Eunuches and (being no more men) shall be slaues vnto the King of Babylon. All which God gaue him to vnderstand before it hapned. For which cause Ezechias was sore troubled, to heare these tidings, saying, that he desired that his people might not fall into those miseries: but since it was impossible to change the decree of God, he required that he might haue peace during his life time. Of this Balad king of Babylon, Berosus maketh mention. This Prophet truly diuine, and admirable for the verity of his prophecies, is accounted to haue spoken nothing that was vntrue, but to haue left in writing all that which he prophecied: the truth whereof hath afterwards in effect appeared to posteritie. Neither did he alone performe this much; but besides him, twelue others haue done the like: and all that which is hapned vnto vs, either good or euill, hath fallen out truly according to their prophecies. But hereafter we will speake of euery one of them. Now when as Ezechias had liued his prefixed time (according as we haue forespoken) and gouerned his kingdome in peace, he died when he was fifty foure yeeres olde, and in the nine and twentieth yeere of his raigne.

The Kings of Chaldaea and Babylon warre against Manasses, and take him prisoner.

Isonne Manasses (the sonne of Achiba, a woman borne in Ierusalem (succeeded him in the kingdome. This man forooke his fathers waies, and followed sinister customes, expressing in his manners all kinds of mischiefe, nor omitting any impietie, but adding himselfe to all the iniquities of the Israelites, who were destroyed because of their finnes committed against God. Hee was so impudent as hee spared not to pollute the very temple of God, the Citie, and the whole countrey: for making his entrie, in despite of God, he slew afterwards all those that were vertuous men among the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets; yet so it is, that he killed euery day some: so that Ierusalem was ouerflowne with blood. For which cause God being prouoked vnto wrath by these his so hainous offences, sent diuers Prophets the one after the other, both to the king and to the people, by whom he threatened to inflict the same calamities vpon them, which (for contempt of religion) the Israelites their brethren had a little before that suffered. But they vnwilling to giue trust to these speeches of theirs (whose admonitions had they respected they might haue auoided their imminent euills) at length in effect experimented rimented the truth thereof. For whereas they persevered in their accustomed and dissolute manners, God incensed the king of Chaldaea and Babylon against them; who sending his army into Iudaea, and spoiling the whole region, at length surprised and led away Manasses prisoner, and made him subiect to what punishment it should please them to inflict vpon him. At last the wretch (taught by his owne mischiefe) acknowledged his sinne, and humbly besought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy courteous and mercifull: neither did God shew himself inexorable; but hauing compassion on his miseries, gaue care vnto him; and after some space of time, the Babylonian sending him home, restored him to his former gouernment. As soone as he was returned backe to Ierusalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to shew the fruits of repentance, and to feare God in all things, cleansing his spirit of all those sinnes, whereunto before time he was addicted. Hee purged the temple also, and cleansed the Citie; and from that time forward, he addicted himselfe wholly to thinke how he might giue God thanks, for that he had thus retired him from ruine, and how he might passe all the remnant of his life in his fauour. He taught the people likewise to doe the like, telling them what miseries they had endured within a few yeers, for that they had demeaned themselves impiously. Hee repaired the altar also, and according to Moses precept offered thereon solemne sacrifices: and after that hee had puraued those things that concerned the seruice of God, as it appertained; hee bethought himselfe likewise of the security of the City of Ierusalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined wals, annexing also an other inclosure thereunto, and erecting high towers likewise, furnishing the same with munition and victuall sufficient for a City of defence. And so much was hee changed during the rest of his life, that he was held most happy; and after the time he began to serue God, I diuers tooke example of vertue by imitating him. After he had liued sixtie and seauen yeers, he dyed in the fiftie and fiftieth yeere of his raigne, and was buried in his garden. His kingdom came into the hands of his sonne Amos, the sonne of Emalsema, of the Citie of Iabath, who imitating his fathers youthly course, was slaine in his owne house, by a conspiracy plotted by his owne household seruants, after he had accomplished the yeers of foure and twenty, and reigned two. After his death the people slew his murderers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdom was giuen to his son Josias, who was only eight yeers olde.

CHAP. III.

The History of Josias.

Josias mother was of the City of Boiceth, and was called Seda: hee was a man of a good nature, and of his owne insinck inclined to vertue, conforming himselfe to the customs and manners of his progenitor Dauid, both in the scope and rule of all his life. When he grew to betwelve yeers old, he gaue manifest approbation of his pietie and iustice: for hee drew the people to a conformable course of life, and to the detestation and abolishing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the seruice of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And considering the actions of his predecessors, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no lesse circumspection, then if he had been an olde man; and that which he found to be correspondent and aduicely done by them, that did hee both maintaine and imitate. All these things did hee both by reason of his innatred wisdom, as also by the admonishments and counsailes of the elders: for following orderly the lawes (both in respect of publike policie, as also in religion) he walked vprightly, in that by obseruing them hee could not erre. For circuiting both the City & the whole country, the king rased down and defaced the woods that were made for strange gods, and overthrew their altars; and all those gifts that had been offered vnto them by his predecessors, were defaced in a mockerie: and in this manner caused hee the people to returne to the seruice of God, and to forsake the honour they did vnto Idols. Hee offered likewise the ordinary sacrifices and burnt offerings vpon the altar, and established Iudges and magistrates to determine publike debates, and to doe each man right, charging them to haue no lesse respect of equity, then they had of their owne liues. He sent also thorow all the countrey, M commanding all those that would be contributors, either in gold or siluer, towards the reparation of the temple, should bring in their beneuolence according to their wils, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, hee appointed superintendents, both ouer the temple, as also ouer the charges that were defraied in the reparation thereof: namely, Amasias, who was already gouernor of the City, and Saphan the secretary, and Iosia Committee ouer the registers, with the high Priest Eloia: who with al expedition and diligence prouided workmen, and all that which

A which was requisite for the building, and began the work. This sodaine and speedy reparation of the temple gaue a manifest testimonie of the kings pietie: who when he had attained to the eighteenth yeere of his age, sent Eloia the high Priest, and caused him to melt downe the remainder of the money that was giuen towards the building of the temple, and to make vessels, cups, and ewers, for the seruice of the Altar. He commaunded also, that all the gold and siluer that was in the treasure should be brought forth, and emploied after the like manner in cups, and other vessels. Now whilst the high Priest searched the treasure, hee found the sacred bookes of Moses in the temple, which he brought and deliuered to the Scribe Saphan: who after he had perused the same, presented them vnto the King, giuing him to vnderstand, that all that which hee had commaunded was accomplished: besides that, he read the bookes vnto him; which when the king had heard, he rent his clothes, and called Eloia the high Priest vnto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends, and sent them vnto the Prophetesse Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignitie, and famous, by reason of his nobilitie: commanding them that when they came vnto her, they should endeuour to appease Gods wrath, and labour to recouer his fauour; because it was to be feared, that by reason that their ancestors had transgressed the laws of Moses, they should be in danger to be dispossessed of their countrey; and abandoned by all men, should at length perish miserably.

When the Prophetesse had heard the kings commandement, shee willed those that were sent vnto her to returne vnto the king, and to certifie him from her, that God had giuen a sentence against them, which might not be reuoked, by any prayers whatsoever; namely, that since they had transgressed the law of Moses, the people should perish, and should be cast out of their country, & deprived of all their goods that they had, and for that they haue not growne to amendment in so long time; notwithstanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, and had foretold the punishment of their impieties, which should happen vnto them, to the end that they might beleeue that God is God, & that he faileth not in anything that he hath foretold by his prophets. Furthermore she said, that he forbore as yet to send these afflictions vpon them, for Josias sake, who was a more vertuous man: but that after his decess God would poure his intended punishments vpon the people. This prophetic of the woman they signified vnto the king: who sent into all parts, & assembled the people in Ierusalem, commanding the priests and Levites, and generally all men without distinction of age, or person, to be present in that conuention. Now when they were assembled, hee first of all caused the sacred bookes to be read, and afterwards standing aloft vpon his throne, hee caused all the people to sweare and promise that they would serue God, and keepe Moses lawes. Whereupon all of them did willingly approue whatsoever he said, promising to doe that whereunto they were exhorted. And therewithall offering vp present sacrifices vnto God, they besought him to shew himselfe fauourable and mercifull towards them. The king likewise commanded the high Priest, that if there were any necessarie in the temple which were made by his predecessors, in honour of Idols and strange Gods, he should cast it out. And after that a great quantitie was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the ashes afterwards were scattered here and there. And as touching the Priests (that appertained to Idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When these things were thus executed in Ierusalem, he came afterwards to the plaine countrey; and all that which Ieroboam had erected there in honour of Idols, he utterly defaced it, and the bones of the false prophets were burnt vpon the Altar that Ieroboam had builded. This had the prophet foretold that came to Ieroboam, at such time as he offered sacrifice, and told him in the presence of all the people, all that which should happen: namely, that one of Dauids posteritie called Josias, should doe those aboue named things: which propheticooke effect three hundredth, sixtie and one yeere after. After this, king Josias transported himselfe to the Israelites (who had auoided the captiuitie and seruitude of the Assyrians) and perswaded them to forsake their impieties, and the seruices they had performed to strange Gods, and to honour the soveraigne and true God of their fathers, and to cleaue vnto him. Hee made a search also thorow euerie house, borough, and citie, fearing least as yet there should bee any Idoll hidden. Hee likewise sought out the chariots that were made by his ancestors, in honour of the sunne, and all that which was adored whatsoever it were, and utterly abolished the same. After hee had in this sort purged the countrey, hee assembled all the people in Ierusalem, where hee celebrated the feast of vbleauened bread, and the solemnitie of Easter. Towards the performance whereof, he gaue the people young kiddes and lambes, to the number of thirtie thousand, and three thousand bullockes for burnt offerings: and the chiefe amongst the Levites distributed amongst the other Levites fiftie hundredth lambes, and fiftie hundredth bullockes. Hauing therefore such an abundance

Nechao King of Egypt hauing gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the flood Euphrates, to warre against the Medes and Babylonians, who had destroyed the Emphyre of Assyria: for Nechao affected the gouernment of all Asia. Now when he drew neere vnto the Citie of Mende (which was vnder Iofias subiection) king Iofias denied him passage, & would not suffer his armie to march thorow his country. For which cause Nechao sent a herald vnto him, to let him vnderstand, that it was not against him that he made war, but that he bent his course towards Euphrates: for which cause hee wished him in no sort to hinder his intended iourney, least thereby he should be constrained to make warre vpon him. But Iofias respected not this demaund of his, but resolved himselfe to hinder his passage thorowe his country: And truly I suppose that the destinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might haue some occasion to doe some thing against Nechao. For whilest hee disposed his armie, and rode from one band to another, being mounted vpon his chariot, hee was strooken with an arrow that was shot by a certaine Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the spleene hee had in warre. For feeling himselfe sorely oppressed with paine, by reason of his wound, hee commanded his armie to retyre, and returned himselfe to Ierusalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after hee had liued nine and thirtie yeares, and reigned thirtie and one. For him the people mourned with great heauinesse, lamenting and sorrowing for many dayes. The Prophet Ieremy also made a deploation ouer him in lamentable verse, which is as yet extant euen in these dayes. This prophet left in writing those euils that should afterwards happen vnto the citie, and the captiuitie wherewith wee are intangled at this present, and the surprisall of Babylon. Neither hath hee alone foretolde the same: but the Prophet Ezechiel hath likewise done the like; who first left two bookes written of the same argument. These two prophets were of the race of the priests. But Ieremy kept in Ierusalem, from the fourteenth yeare of the raigne of Iofias, vntill the destruction of the Citie and Temple; as in time and place convenient wee will declare, setting downe those occurrences that hapned to this prophet. After the death of Iofias (heretofore mentioned) his sonne Iozaz succeeded him in the kingdome, at such time as he was twentie and three yeeres old, who reigned in Ierusalem; his mother's name was Ametala: hee was a man full of impietie, and of a malignant and peruerse nature. The King of Egypt returning from the warre, sent vnto Iozaz, commanding him to meet with him in Samath a Citie of Syria, where he was no sooner arrived, but hee kept him prisoner, committing the kingdome to Eliacim his brother (on the fathers side) who was his elder brother likewise. L He changed his name also, and called him Iochim: hee imposed a tribute also on Iudæa, of one hundred talents of siluer, and a talent of gold, which Iochim paid. And as touching Iozaz, hee led him into Egypt, where he finished his dayes, after hee had bene king three moneths, and ten dayes. Now Iochim's mother was called Zabuda, of the Citie of Abuma. He was a wicked person, and of a malignant nature, hauing neither pietie towards God, nor respect of equitie towards men.

Nabuchodonosor's armie commeth into Syria.

The year of the world, 3336, before Christ's birth, 627.
Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon warreth against the Egyptians.

IN the fourth yeare of his raigne, a certaine man called Nabuchodonosor, possessed the kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great armie against Carchabab (a Citie situate neere vnto Euphrates) resolving with himselfe to fight against Nechao King of Aegypt, vnder whose power all Syria was subiect. Nechao vnderstanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his armie was, made verie little account thereof, but with a huge armie addrested himselfe towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulse Nabuchodonosor. But he was

As was overcome in battell, and lost diuers thousands of his men. VWhereupon, the Babylonian (palsing Euphrates) seized all Syria as far as Pelusium (Iudæa only excepted.) The fourth yeare that Nabuchodonosor reigned ouer these conquered countries, & the eight yeare of the raigne of Iochim ouer the Hebrewes, the Babylonian led forth his army against the Iewes, with a mighty power, threatening them to vse all hostility, except Iochim would pay him tribute. Iochim fearing his threats bought his peace with siluer, and paid for three yeeres space the tributes that were imposed on him. But in the third yeare (vnderstanding that the Aegyptian was vp in armes against the Babylonian) he denied the payment of the tribute; notwithstanding he was frustrated of his hope, for the Aegyptians were not so hardy as to make warre. All which the Prophet Ieremie daily foretold him, signifying vnto him that he builded his hope in vain vpon the Aegyptians, and that it would fall out that the Citie should be ouerthrown by the king of Babylon, and Iochim himselfe should be deliuered prisoner into his hands. But because there was no means for them to escape this iustice, all that which he said was nothing auailable. For notwithstanding the people and gouernours heard therof, yet made they no reckoning of the same; but were displeased with those counsailes, which he proposed vnto them, accusing Ieremy as if he took pleasure to vtter and publish ominous and aduerser presages against the king: they likewise called him in question before the kings counsell, and required that he might be condemned. VWhereupon some of them gaue sentence against him: the rest reprouing the aduise of the elders that were thus addicted, tooke a more discrete course, and caused the Prophet to depart out of the kings house, forbidding his aduersaries to doe him any mischief: they protesting that he had not only foretolde the future calamities of the citie, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas and diuers others; & yet that no one of them had suffered any euill by the kings of their time, but that contrariwise Micheas had been honored as a Prophet sent from God. By these words they appeased the people, and deliuered Ieremy from the death intended against him. This man wrote all his prophecies; and read them to the people in their fasts, and assembled them in the temple in the ninth moneth of the fift yeare yeare of the raigne of Iochim, which book he had composed touching that which should happen vnto the Citie, the temple, and the people. VWhen the gouernours heard the same, they took the booke from him, and commanded that both hee and his secretary Baruch should withdraw themselves out of the sight of men: and they took the booke, and presented it vnto the king; who in the presence of his friends, commaunded his secretary to read the same: and after he had heard the contents therof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and rending it in pieces, cast it into the fire, intending that it should neuer be seene. He sent out likewise a strict commission to seek out Ieremy and his secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be punished: But they had preuented his indignation.

Iochim paid Nabuchodonosor tribute.

Moreover he tooke three thousand of the most honorable Citizens of Ierusalem prisoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongst whom was the Prophet Ezechiel, at that time very young in years. For which cause he sent out certaine forces and besieged Iochan in Ierusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an vpright heart, was loath to forsake the Citie in that danger without a gouernour, considering that it was for his cause that the common weale was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his neereft kin with him, he deliuered them into the hands of the captaines that were sent against him, receiuing an oath from them, that neither they nor the Citie should receiue any harme. But this promise continued not a yeare: for the king of Babylon obserued it not, but commanded his captaines to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the Citie, and to bring them bound vnto him. The king of fused to receiue the king of Ie-rusalem, in out-

Nabuchodonosor with all his army, and drew out of Syria.

IN stead of Iochan, hee appointed Sedechias his Vnckle King of Ierusalem, whom hee bound by an oath that he should gouerne the countrey without any innouation, or partiall fauour towards the Egyptians. This Sedechias was one and twentie yeares old at such time as he came vnto the kingdome; & was Iochans brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all lawes, and a peruerter of ordinances. For the young men that were about him were without the feare of God, and all the people vnder his dominions committed whatsoeuer outrages were best liking vnto them. For this cause the Prophet Ieremie came vnto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, that if he remained not all those impieties, and iniquities he vied, and addid not himselfe to that which was ill (but gave care vnto his gouernours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false prophets that misled him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make warre against his Citie; but that the Egyptians should leue an armie and ouercome them) that then he should die a miserable death: for (said he) they haue no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce, are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gave care to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, & very profitable both for him, & his people: but anon after his friends corrupted him, & directed him according to their owne opinions. Ezechiel also at the same time, had prophesied in Babylon all those calamities which were to fall vpon the temple, & sent notice to Ierusalem of that which he had receiued fro God. Notwithstanding, Sedechias gave no credit to his prophecies, by reason that all the Prophets were accustomed to report in all things the one with the other, touching the fall of the Citie, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezechiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Ieremie had prophesied, that the king of Babylon should lead him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these were in discord in their sayings, he concluded that the manner wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things hap- ping vnto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, hee would not declare his discontent: place. At that time hee had continued his alliance and friendship with the king of Babylon for the space of eight yeares, he brake the league that was betwene them, and conspired with the Egyptians (vnder hope that they should ouercome the Babylonians). Which when the king of Babylon vnderstood, he led forth his armie against him, and destroyed his army in the vntermost: so that after he had taken his Citie of defence, hee finally placed his gins about the Citie of Ierusalem. The Egyptian perceiuing the estate wherein his allye Sedechias was, leuied a huge armie, and came into Iudaa with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his armie from Ierusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and ouer- came him in battell, and pursued him with such alacritie, that he put him to flight, and draue him altogether out of Syria. As soone as the Babylonian was dislodged from Ierusalem, the false pro- phets

A phets deceived Sedechias, telling him that the Babylonian should neuer more returne, to make warre either against him, or his nation, and that he should neuer any more depart from his house in Babylon; and that they who had beene led away captiues, should returne home againe, laden with those vessels of the Temple which the king of Babylon had taken from them.

But the Prophet Ieremie presenting himselfe before the king, prophesied the contrary to these impostors, assuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by meanes of the Egyptians; for that the Babylonians should ouercome them, and should returne and encampe before Ierusalem, and besiege the same, and destroy the people by famine, and lead them away prisoners that were remaining, and carry away all their substance; & that after they were seized of the riches of their temple, they should finally burne the same. As for the Citie, they should raise it: and (said he) they shall keepe vs captiue for the space of seuentie yeares: And from this seruitude the Persians and Medes shall deliuer vs, at such time as they haue gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babylonians: then shall they send vs backe againe into our countrey, and we shall build our temple anew, and establish the Citie of Ierusalem. Diuerse men gaue credit to these words of Ieremie; but the gouernours and contemners of God, intricated him verie cruelly, as if he had beene a man transported out of his sense. And whereas he had an intent to visit his native countrey Anathoth, some twentie stounds off of Ierusalem, one of the Magistrates encountering him in his iourney, & laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this slander, that he went & stole away to submit himselfe to the Babylonians. But Ieremie answered that he was falsely accused, & that he repaired onely to the place where he was borne. This Prince giuing him no credit, arrested him, and brought him before the iudgement seat, where he sustained all sorts of outrages and torments, & was shut vp in prison to be punished, & remained there for a time, suffering the extremities of wrong and iniurie. The ninth yeare of the raigne of Sedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth month, the king of Babylon came and encamped the second time before Ierusalem, and entrenched himselfe round about the same, for the space of eightene moneths, and laid batterie and siege thereto, with as great spleene as might be possible: And they that were besieged therein, were encountered with two most hainous afflictions, famine, and most grievous pestilence. At this time the Prophet Ieremie being in prison, held not his peace, but cried with a loud voice, and preached, and exhorted the people, willing them to entertaine the Babylonians, and to open their gates vnto them: because that in so doing they might warrantize themselves withall their families, whereas otherwise they were assured of destruction. He foretold them also, that if any one remained in the Citie, he should most assuredly, either perish by famine, or the enemies furie: but if so be they submitted themselves to the enemies mercie, they should escape from death. But those gouernours that heard him speake after this sort, gaue him no credit; in that they were not as yet pressed with the danger: for which cause they came vnto the king, and after a dispitefull manner, told him all that which had beene spoken, accusing Ieremie, and reprouing him for a mad man; vrging this, that hee had abated their courage, and by his wofull predictions, had weakened the hearts of the people, which were otherwise readie to fight for him and their country, by reason that he flying vnto the enemy, menaced them with the surprisall and utter ruine of their Citie. But the king in regard of the naturall humanitie and iustice that was in him, was not any waies whetted in respect of his owne interest, yet to the intent he might not seeme to be utterly opposed to the gouernours, by contradicting them, he deliuered the Prophet into their hands, to deale with him howsoeuer they pleased. Who hauing obtained this libertie from the king, entred the prison on the sodaine, and laying hold on Ieremie, they let him downe into a pit full of mud, to the intent hee might die in that place, and be strangled by the ordure: in effect, he was set therein vp to the necke. But one of the kings seruants (an Aethiopian by nation) certified the king of the Prophets affliction, assuring him that his friends and gouernours did not iustly, so to thrust and burie the Prophet in the mud, & cursedly to conspire against him, tying him with bonds and tortures worse then death. For which cause the king hearing this newes, was sorie that he had deliuered the Prophet to the Gouernours; and commanded the Aethiopian to tak thirtie men of his court with him (with cords and such other things necessarie, as might concerne the safetie of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliuer him from that captiuitie. Hereupon the Aethiopian furnished with men and necessarie meanes, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and dismissed him without any gard. That done, the king sent for him in secret, demanding of him if he had any message to deliuer him from God, praying him to let him vnderstand whatsoeuer he knew as touching the successe of the siege. The Prophets answer was, that although he should tel him, yet it would not be beleecued; & that if he should ex-pointed Godolias the sonne of Aicam gouernour (a man that was both vpright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their assigned tribute to the king. Hee drew the Prophet Jeremy also out of prison, perswading him to repaire with him to the king of Babylon, telling him that hee had receiued expresse commaundement from the king, to furnish him with all things necessarie for that iourney: but if hee were not contented to repaire to Babylon, hee should declare vnto him in what place hee would make his aboad, to the intent hee might certi-fie the king thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or sojourn in any other place, desiring rather to liue amidst the ruines of his countrey, and among the pitious reliques of his poore nation.

When the generall Nabuzardan vnderstood his resolution, he gaue charge to the gouernour Godolias (whom he left in Iudæa) to haue care of him, and to furnish him with all that which he wanted, and after he had gratified him with presents, hee departed. Meane while Jeremy dwelt in the Citie of Maphath, praying Nabuzardan that hee would lend him his discipule Baruch (the son of Neria, a man of a noble family, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as these that during the siege of Ierusalem were retired out of the Citie, vnderstood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they assembled together from all parts, and came to Maphath to Godolias, vnder the conduct of Iohn the son of Careas, and Iezanias and Sareas, and others. And besides these, a certaine man called Ismael of the blood royall, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the siege of the Citie, had retired himselfe to Bathal king of the Ammonites, and had sojourned with him during all the troubles. Who being in this sort assembled before him, Go-doliass counselled to remaine in that countrey without any feare of the Babylonians, promising that in manuring their land they should incur no inconuenience. All which he confirmed vnto them by an oth; adding further, that if any disturbance were offered to any man, hee would readily assist him. Hee gaue each one this aduice likewise, to inhabit any Citie that best liked them; promising them to send them thither, with such things as appertained to them, to build their houses and turnish their habitations; promising them that when time serued, hee would make their prouision of come, wine, and oyle for their maintenance during the winter time: which when hee had proposed these conditions vnto them, hee gaue them leaue to depart, and inhabite the countrey wherfoeuer they best liked. Now when the rumour ran amongst the people of Iudæa, that Godolias had thus curteously entertained those that were fugitiues, & how he had permitted them to inhabit & till the countrey (provided that they payd their tribute to the Babylonian) diuers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the countrey. And Iohn and the other gouernours being with him, and assured both of his clemencie and courtesie, began intirely to loue him. For which cause they told him, that Bathal king of the Ammonites had sent Ismael to murder him by som treacherie, that by that means he might haue the dominion ouer the Israelites that remained, in that he was of the blood royall. Assuring him that the means of his deliuerance from that treason, was, if so be he would commaund them to kill Ismael in secret: assuring him on the contrary side, that they feared, that if Ismael should happen to kill him, their whole nation that remained, was like to fall to vter ruine. But Godolias tolde them plainly, that these stratagems they intended, were practised against a man that had receiued pleasure at his hands; and that it was not likely that hee whom hee had succoured during the time of his ne-cessitie, would be so wicked or impious against his benefactor, as to attempt to murder him, whome in any occasion or necessitie hee could not but to his great shame and indignitie, either sle or forsake. Yea, said he, although those things were true which you informe me of, yet had I rather die, then oppress a man that hath committed his life to my trust. For which cause Iohn and the rest (seeing their perswasions were in vaine) departed from him. Some thirtie dayes after, Ismael (accompanied with ten men) came to Maphath to Godolias, who receiued them with presents and magnificent entertainment, so that to expresse to Ismael and his companions how har-tily they were welcome, Godolias drunke so hard that he was somewhat ouerseene with wine. Now when Ismael perceiued him to be in that key, and overloden with drinke and sleepe, hee stept vnto him with his ten associates, & cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him companie at the banquet: after which murder, hee issued out by night and slew all the Jewes that were left in the citie, & those Babylonian soldiers also that were left in garrison in that place. The next day there came fourescore men of the countrey to Godolias with presents, being vterly ignorant of that which had hapned. Ismael knowing them, called them vnto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as loone as they were entred, hee locked the court and slew them, and afterwards cast their bodies into a deep ditch, to the intent they might not be discouered. Of this number there

A there were some that escaped, who brought him that they might not be put to death, before they had deliuered, as vaine trifles; garments and come that they had hidden in the field: which when Ismael understood, he spared them: but he kept them prisoners that were in Maphath, with their wives and children, the number of whom were the daughters of Sedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired backe againe to the king of the Ammonites, Iohn and the gouernours of his companie, vnderstanding of the act committed by Ismael in Maphath, and about all of the murder of Godolias; they were wonderfully displeased: so that each of them assembling his priuate force, issued forth to pursue and persecute Ismael; who they ouerooke neere vnto a fountaine in Hebron. The prisoners that were with Ismael, seeing Iohn his confederates, took courage, supposing that it was some succors that came to help them, and forsooke him that led them, and began to ioyne with Iohns followers; and thus fled Ismael with his eight men, to the king of the Ammonites. Iohn gathering together all those whom he had released from Ismaels hands, both Euauches, women, and children; retired into a certaine place called Mandra, where he sojourned all that day, resolving from thence to depart into Aeg-ypt, fearing least the Babylonians should put him to death; if they should remaine in Iudæa, for that they would be displeased with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the go-uernment.

Iohn released Ismaels cap-tiues.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with these deliberations, they addressed themselves to the Prophet Jeremy, beseeching him to Enquire of God, and to certifie them, what it behoued them to do in this their doubtfull estate, binding themselves by an oath to do that which Jeremy should G commaund them. Herevpon the Prophet promised that hee would aske counsell of God for them, and some ten daies after, God appeared vnto him, and willed him to certifie Iohn, the go-uernour, and the rest of the people, that if they inhabited Iudæa he would assist them; and haue care of them, and keepe them so, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) should doe them no harm: but if they departed into Aegypt, he would abandon them, and would be so incensed against them, that he would thrall them in the like miserie, as their brethren had indured in times past. Whilest the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not beleue him, in that he commanded them to remaine in that place: by Gods precript. ordinance: but they imagined that vnder a false pretext of Gods commaund, he had counselled them therto, but that in effect he spake in fauour of his discipule Baruch, perswading them to stay there, to the end they might be D consumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counsell which God gaue them by the Prophet, both Iohn, and the rest of the multitude went into Aegypt, and led with them both Baruch and Jeremie. Whither they were no sooner come, but God told the prophet that the Babylonia should lead his army into Aegypt, for which cause he willed him to foretel the people that Aegypt should be destroyed, and that they should partly be slain in that place, and partly led cap-tiue to Babylon. Which came in like mannerto passe: for in the fift yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem (which was the three and twentieth yeare of the raigne of Nabuchodonosor) Nabuchodo-nosor in his owne person led his army into Coelosyria, and hauing conquered the same, hee made waite vpon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought these nations vnder his obeisance, he went and fought against the king of Aegypt, and ouercame him: and after hee had E slaine their king that gouerned at that time, and planted another in his place, hee afterwards tooke the Jewes that he found in that countrey, and carried them prisoners into Babylon. By this meanes we haue learned, that the state of the Hebrews being brought to this point, hath bin translated twise to the other side of Euphrates. For the people of the two tribes were captiued by the Assyrians, during the raigne of Osai; and consequently that of the two tribes, vnder Na-buchodonosor king of the Babylonians and Chaldees, vpon the taking in of Ierusalem. True it is that Salmatazar, after he had displaced the Israelites, planted the Cutheans in their place; who before time inhabited the innermost of the countreies of Persia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian hauing led the two tribes prisoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

tions, whom he subdued by force. He allowed them victuall from his owne table, and they were taught and instructed in the discipline of the countrey, and in the Chaldean tongue. These were verie apt to learne wisdom: and for that cause he commaunded that they should be trained vp in the exercise therof. Of these there were foure of Zedechias kindred, faire in bodie, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Misael, and Azarias; whose names the Babylonians changed, and willed them to be called by other names, different from their owne. Daniel was called Balthasar; Ananias, Sidrach; Misael, Misack; and Azarias, Abdennago. These did the king esteeme very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attaine vnto learning and wisdom, wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cause highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinsmen thought good to liue chastely, and to abstaine from those meates that came from the kings table; and in general from all things that had life, they went vnto Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beseeching him to conuert those meates to his owne vse, which were sent them from the kings table, and allow them herbes and dates, and such things as had no life; because they intended to hold that course of life, and to forsake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condescend vnto their demaunds; but that he feared, least being called for by the king, they should be found to be leane in bodie, and discoloured in face (for without doubt in following that diet, they must needly lose their colours, and bee lesse disposd in comparisn of others) which might be the cause to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiuing that Askenas intended nought else but his securitie, perswaded him to allow them but ten daies of approbation, vnder condition that if by that regiment of diet their habitude of bodie should not be any waies altered, they might continue in that fashion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they should be found leane and weak, and lesse proportionable (then they that fed vpon the kings allowance) that then they should returne to their accustomed diet. Now it so fell out, that not onely their bodies were better in growth, but they seemed rather better fed, and of a taller stature then the rest: so that they that liued vpon the kings ordinarie, seemed leane and wearish; whereas Daniel and his companions made shewe, as if they had beene nourished with dainties, and brought vp in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the foure young men from the kings table, and boldly kept it to him selfe, giuing them in stead thereof, the diet that they chose and delighted in. They hauing their spirits more pure and subtill, so comprehend their masters instructions, and their bodies more strong to endure labour (for their spirits were not charged with diuersitie of meates, nor their bodies effeminated for the same cause) attained the more readily to all that doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrewes and Chaldees: Daniel especially hauing profited in wisdom, studied the interpretation of dreames, and God appeared vnto him. Two years after the surprisall of Aegypt, king Nabuchodonosor dreamed a wonderful dreame, the issue whereof God made him see in a dreame: but he forgate the same when he arose out of his bed. And for that cause sent he for his Chaldees and diuines, telling them that hee had dreamed a dreame, but that hee had forgot the same, commanding them to declare vnto him what the dreame was, and the signification therof also. Whereunto they answered, that it was impossible for men to sound out the secret therof; notwithstanding they promised him, that if he would declare his vision vnto them, they would cause him to vnderstand the signification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonosor threatened them with death, except they represented his dreame vnto him; and they protesting that they could not fulfill his request, he commaunded them all to bee slaine. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions had part in that danger, addressed himselfe to Ariochus the captaine of the Kings guard, requiring him to informe him, for what cause the King had adiudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: And hauing intelligence what had hapned as touching the dream, & how the king by forgetting the same, had charged them to informe him therein, & how they had answered that it was impossible for them to perform the same, and how thereby they had prouoked the king to displeasure: he besought Ariochus to goe vnto the king, and to procure one nights reprieue in the behalfe of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night time to beseech God and increat from him both the dreame and the signification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the king what Daniel had requested, who respited the execution of the Magicians for that night, vntill he might see what would become of Daniels promise: who retiring himselfe with his companions into his chamber, besought God all the night long to manifest vnto him the dreame; and deliuer the Magicians and Chaldees from the kings wrath, with whom both he and the rest of his compa-

A companions were like to die, except he might know what the king had dreamt the night past, and what was the interpretation therof. Whereupon God (hauing compassion of the daunger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniels wisdom) signified vnto him both the dreame, and the signification therof, to the intent the King might bee resolved in the meaning therof.

Daniel hauing receiued the truth from God, arose very ioyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gaue them courage and hope of life. Hauing therefore rendered thanks vnto God, for that he had had compassion of their young yeares, as soone as it was day he went vnto Arioch, requesting him, that he might be brought to the Kings presence, certifying him that hee would open vnto him the dreame which he had seene the night past. Now when Daniel was brought vnto the kings presence, he besought him that hee would not esteeme him to bee more wile then the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his dreame, hee did attempt to expresse the same: for that came not to passe, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had compassion on vs that were in daunger of death; and at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my countrie men life, he hath certified me both of your dreame, and the signification thereof. I was not so much agrieved for that in our innocencie we were adiudged to death by thee, as afraid of thine estimation and glorie, which was hazarded by condemning so manie and so innocent and iust men to death: whereas that which you haue required of them saoureth nothing of humane wit,

The vision & the Revelation thereof opened to Daniel.

But is the onely worke of God: Whilest therefore thou thoughtest in thy selfe, who it was that should commaund the whole world after thy selfe; at such time as thou wert asleepe, God intending to let thee know all those that should gouerne after thee, presented thee with this dreame. It seemed vnto thee that thou sawest a great statue, whereof the head was of gold; the shoulders & armes of silver; the bellie and thighs of brasie; and the legges and feete of yron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was drawne from a mountaine) that fell vpon the statue, and beate downe and burst the same, and left no whole peece thereof: so that the gold, silver, yron, and brasie, were powdred as small as dust: whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the furie and force thereof, was borne away and scattered into diuers countries: on the other side the stone grewe so mightie, that it seemed to fill the whole earth. This was that vision that appeared vnto you, the signification whereof is expressed after this manner. The head of gold signifieth your selfe (and those kings of Babylon that haue been before you.) The two hands and shoulders signifie that your Empyre shall be destroyed by 2. kings, the one part by the king of the east, clothed in brasie, whose force shall be abated by an other power, resembling that of yron; and he shall haue the power ouer the whole earth, by reason of the nature of yron which is more strong then gold, silver, or brasie, hee told the king also what that stone signified. But for mine owne part, I thought it not expedient to expresse it in this place: because the only butt and intent of my writings is onely to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man haue a desire to know these things, and cannot bridle his curiositie, but will vnderstand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shall find amidst the sacred scriptures.

When king Nabuchodonosor had heard these things, and remembered himselfe of his dream, he was astonished at Daniels wisdom, and casting himselfe prostrate on the earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giuing direction that sacrifice should be offered vnto him, as if he were God. Moreouer he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdome to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their maligners and detractors, hapned to fall into most imminent and dreadfull daunger, vpon this occasion that ensueth. The king built a golden Image sixtie cubites high, and sixe in bignesse, and erected it in a great Plaine neere vnto Babylon; and beeing readie to dedicate the same, he assembled all the gouernours and princes of his countries, commanding them first of all, that as soone as they should heare the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselves on the earth to adore the statue; threatening that whosoever should doe the contrary, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue vpon the sound of the Trumpet, Daniel and his companions utterly refused to performe that dutie, alledging for their iustification that they would not transgresse the lawes of their country: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods prouidence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burne during their abode in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies

After Nabuchodonosors death, his sonne Eulmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incessantly deliuered Iechonias king of Ierusalem out of prison, and held him in the number of his most esteemed friendes, and gaue him presents, and committed the government of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his Father had not kept his promise with Iechonias, when he surrendered himselfe, his wife, children, & friends into his hands, by those that besieged it, as we haue heretofore declared. Eulmerodach died in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, and Niglifar his sonne obtained the kingdome, which hee possessed fortie yeeres, and afterwards died. After him the succession of the kingdome came vnto his sonne called Labofardach, which continued in him but for the space of nine months, and after his death it came vnto Balthasar, who by the Babylonians was called Naboandel. Against him Cyrus king of Persia, and Darius king of Media made warre; and at such time as hee was besieged in Babylon, there hapned a maruailous and prodigious spectacle.

Balthasar late vpon a certaine festiual in a royall chamber, where he was serued with great store of vessel fit for his maiestie and royaltie; and with him at the banquet there sat his concubines, and most intire friends. At which time (to shew his magnificence) hee caused those vessels to be brought out of the temple of his God, which Nabuchodonosor his predecessor (feare to employ to his owne vse) had stowed vp in his Idols temple. But Balthasar was so puffed with pride that he dranke out of them, and employed them to his vses. Now so came it to passe, that whilest hee quaffed, and blasphemed the name of God, he sawe a hand issuing from a wall, which wrote in the same certaine syllables: by which vision being somewhat terrified, he assembled his Magitians and Chaldees, and al that sort of people (who amongst those barbarous nations made profession to interpret prodigies and dreames) to the intent they might signifie vnto him the meaning and vnderstanding of that writing. Now when these Magitians had tolde him that they could in no sort found or vnderstand the same, the king was sore vexed and troubled at this vnexpected vision: whereupon he caused it to be proclaimed thorow his country, that whosoever should read that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would giue him a golden chaine, and a purple robe (such as the king of Chaldees wore) and besides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magitians assembled together with greater course, and were farre more diligent and inquisitiue to finde out the signification of the writing: but they were no lesse grounded therein then they were at the first. Meane while, the kings grandmother seeing him wholy amated in minde, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certaine man amongst the prisoners of Iuda, led thither at such time as Nabuchodonosor destroyed Ierusalem, whose name was Daniel, a man wile and expert in ferching out of things that were impossible, and only knowne vnto God, who evidently expounded that which Nabuchodonosor required, at such time, as no other man could satisfie his demand. Whereupon the king called him vnto his presence, & telling him what proofes he had had heard of his wisdom, & of that diuine spirit that was in him, and how he only was fit to interpret those things which otherwise were obscured from other mens knowledge; hee praid him to informe him what that hand writing signified, promising him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chaine, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with these titles for his wisdom, hee might grow famous amongst all men, who demanding the reason, should knowe the intent why hee was honoured. But Daniel (refusing all these presents of his, in that the wisdom that is giuen from aboue is not corrupted thereby, but is freely answerable to those that haue neede thereof) tolde him that that writing did foretell him the end of his life, because hee had not learned to feare God, neither to lift his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithstanding hee had seene the chastisement wherewith his predecessor had bene punished, for the outrages he committed against God. For that Nabuchodonosor hauing bene driuen to lead his life among beaulls by reason of his impieties, after diuers requests and supplications had obtained mercie, and was returned vnto humane conuersation, and into his owne kingdome, for which cause all the time of his life hee praised Almighty God the gouernour of all things: whereas hee had omitted to do the like, and had blasphemed the name of God in diuers tofts, and had swilled both himselfe bodies that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made them in greater estimation with the king, for that he saw they were vertuous & beloved of God; and for that chiefe they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the King sawe another Vision in his sleep, which signified vnto him, that being cast from his Emphyre, he should couerit with farrage beasts, and that hauing liued in that estate in the desert for the space of seuen yeares, hee should recover his kingdome again. Hauing had this dreame, he assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them either to find out, or declare the intelligence of this dreame vnto the king: Onely Daniel discovered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the king passed the foreclimpt time in the desert, so that no man durst intermeddle with the affaires of estate during seuen yeares. But after he had called vpon God, that it would please him to restore him to his kingdome, hee confessed the same again. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particulars, according as I haue found the written in holy books: for in the entrance of my history I haue answered those objections: so that I haue openly protested, that I will onely faithfully translate the Hebrew Histories into the Greeke tongue: & according to my promise, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine owne, or concealing ought of another mans. After that Nabuchodonosor had reigned forty three yeares, he died: he was a man of execution, and more happy then any of his predecessors. Berosus maketh mention of his actes in the third booke of his Chaldeique historie, where he speaketh thus. His father Nabuchodonosor, hauing notice that the gouernour whom he had appointed ouer Egypt, & the neighbouring parts of Coelofyria & Phoenicia, was revolted from him (being at that time in himselfe vnable to indure the troubles of warre) committed a part of his forces vnto his son Nabuchodonosor, who was in the flower of his age, and sent him forth against him: who encountering the rebell, and fighting with him, ouercame him, and brought the countrey vnder his subiection. Meane while, Nabuchodonosor the father died of a sicknesse in Babylon after he had reigned one and twentie yeares: Nabuchodonosor the sonne, hauing notice of his father death, gaue order to the affaires of Egypt, and the rest of the countrey: and committing the care and transportation of the Iewes, Syrians, Aegyptians, and Phoenicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his armie and carriage, he with a few men made hastie journeyes thorow the desert. And when he had taken the administration of the kingdome vpon him (which in his absence was in the hands of the Chaldees, and by their chieftaine was reserved vntil his returne, vnto his vse) he became Lord of all his fathers Empire. When his prisoners were arrived, he assigned them convenient dwelling places in the countrey of Babylon; and with the spoiles of the warre, he magnificently repaired and decked the Temple of Bel, & other places. He enlarged the olde Citie, and repaired & beautified it with other buildings: by means wherof, they that would besiege the same, were hindered from cutting off of the current of the river, to the preiudice of the inhabitants. He enuironed it inwardly with a trebble wall, and outwardly with as mightie and as many enclosures, and made all of burnt bricke. The walls were magnificently builded, & the gates brauely adorned in maner of temples. He caused a palacet to be builded neere vnto his fathers auncient palace: the magnificence and ornament wherof, I am too weake witted to expresse; onely this thing most memorable, I haue thought good to note downe, that these huge, greates and pompous buildings were finished in fifteene dayes. In this place he had vaults raised so high, that in outward appearance they seemed to bee mountaines, on which all sorts of trees were planted. Hee deuised and prepared also a goodly garden, and called it the hanging garden, because his wife (hauing bene brought vp in the countrey of Media) desired to haue a place conformable to that of her birth. Megasthenes in the fourth booke of his Indian Historie, maketh mention of this garden in that place, where hee enforced himselfe to proue, that this King surpassed Hercules in valour and execution of worthie actions. For he said, that Nabuchodonosor ouercame the chiefe citie of Lybia, and a great part of Spaine. Diocles in the second booke of his Persian Historie, and Philostratus in his Phæcician and Indian Historie, make mention of his King, saying that he ouercame the citie of Tyre, at the end of thirteene yeares; at such time as Ithobal reigned ouer the Tyrians. This is the summe of all that which the Historiographers write as touching this King.

and his concubines in the vessels dedicated to God : For this cause God was displeased with him, and certified him by this writing, what ende he should expect. Whereupon hee expounded the writing in these tearmes. Mene (which is as much to say, as number) sheweth that God hath numbered the daies of thy life and dominion, which shall endure but a little while. Thekel signifieth a ballance; God therefore (said hee) waying thy government (sheweth that it shall be o- uerthrowne: Phares, this word signifieth a fragment, God shall breake thy kingdome, and shall diuide it amongst the Medes, and Persians. When the king had heard this interpretation, hee was verie sorrowfull (according as the nature of things so disastrous, and so apparant required.) Notwithstanding hee delaied not to performe those presents which he had promised the Propher, although (as he well perceiued) the words aboaded him ill, and gaue him all that which he pro- mised him, considering with himselfe, that it was his owne destinie that hee ought to accuse, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithstanding they were verie vnfaourie in his eare. Not long after, this Balthasar and the Cric were ouerthrowne and ta- ken by Cyrus king of Persia and his army. For this was that Balthasar, vnder whom, and in the se- uenteenth yeare of whose raigne, the surprisal of Babylon hapned. This as farre as I could gather, was the end of king Nabuchodonosors posteritie.

Darius, who (with his allie Cyrus) had destroyed the estate of the Babylonians, was threescore and two yeeres olde at such time as he tooke Babylon. He was Astyages sonne, and is otherwayes called by the Greekes. Hee tooke the Propher Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him neere vnto him, doing him much honour: for hee was of the number of the three gouernors whom hee constituted ouer three hundred and threescore prouinces; for so had Darius com- manded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and onely trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grieuouly hated: for they are most hainouly ha- ted, who haue greatest interest in Princes fauours. Whereas therefore they that were iealous of the good esteeme which he had with Darius, sought occasion to caluminate and backbite him, hee warily cut off all opportunitie thereof: for hee would neither be bribed with siluer, nor corrup- ted with presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonestie, to receiue gifts after a man had done any curtesies. Hee therefore gaue his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his re- putation. Yet notwithstanding, they seeing they could finde no hole in his coate, whereby his honour might bee touched, blamed, or calumniated, they sought out a new meanes to disgrace him. For they perceiuing that Daniel did thrise euerie day make his prayers vnto God, they sup- posed that they had found a iust pretext to worke his ruine: For which cause they came vnto Darius, certifying him that the princes and gouernours had concluded together to this effect: That for thirte daies space an intermission should be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawfull for them to demaund any thing, neither of himselfe, or of any man or God what- soeuer; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered that hee should be cast into the Lyons denne. But the King perceiuing not the drift of their ma- lice, nor how they sought by this deuise to entrap Daniel, told them that hee liked of the decree, and promised to confirme the same, and propounded a publike edict, wherein the princes reso- lutions were ratified. Now whilest all men endeouored thorow feare, carefully and diligently to obserue this edict, Daniel let light thereby, and according to his accustomed manner standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed vnto him. Whereupon, the Princes (hauing got that occasion which they long expected) came readily vnto the king, and accused Daniel for that hee only amongst the rest had presumed to infringe their decree: vrging moreouer, that hee did it not for the religion sake that was in him, but because he was obserued and watcht by his mali- gnors. And for that they feared least Darius by reason of the great affection hee bare vnto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding hee had transgressed their edict) they conclu- ded vpon no milder iudgement, but that hee might bee cast into the Lyons denne, according to the forme of the edict. Darius hoping that God would deliuer Daniel, and that no harme should befall him by the iawes of wilde beafts, exhorted him patiently to endure that aduenture. Now as soone as he was cast into the denne, the king sealed vp the stone that closed the mouth thereof, and departed, spending all that night without repast or repose, so grieuouly was hee discompered in Daniel behalfe. And when the day was come, as soone as he arose he came vnto the den, and finding the seale vnbroken wherewith he had marked the stone, hee opened the same, and called vnto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if hee were whole and in safetie. Hee hearing the king speake, answered that he had receiued no hurt: whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lyons den. His aduersaries perceiuing that Daniel had escaped all incon- ueniences Aueniens (because that God had taken care of him) would not that hee should escape: and there- vpon told the king that the Lions did neither touch nor approche Daniel, because they had been fed and gorged before. For which cause, the king displeased with their iniurious malice, com- manded a quantitie of flesh to be cast vnto the Lions; and when they were glutted, hee willed that Daniel enemies should be cast among them, to the intent hee might know whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius saw verie manifestly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as soone as the Nobles were cast into the den, the Lions spared not one of them, but tore them all in peeces, as if they had beene hungry and without meate. I suppose that these Lions hauing bene a little before glutted with meat, did not annoy these men by reason of their famine; but I rather iudge that their malignitie did whet on their furie: for when as God so pleaseth, vnreasonable creatures doe iustice vpon ma- lignant and enuious men. Daniel aduersaries being in this sort exterminate and destroyed, Darius gaue notice hereof to all the subiects of his prouinces, praying that God whom Daniel adored; laying, that he was the onely true God, who had all power: hee honoured Daniel likewise with especiall regard, esteeming him amongst the chiefeft of his familiars. Hee therefore being thus famous and admirable (because he was beloued by God) builded in Ecabatane in the coun- trey of the Medes a magnificent castell, and a marvellous monument that remaineth euen vnto this day, which seemeth to those that looke thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that verie day which they behold the same; the beautie thereof seemeth so liuing and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no sort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they wax olde and are enfeebled by yeares, and lose their beautie; at this day all the Kings of Media, Persia, and Parthia, are entombed in this Castell, and the charge thereof is committed to a Priest, who is a Jew: and this custome continueth euen vntill this day. Neither is that to be buried in silence, which is worthy especiall admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicitie that was incident to a most famous Propher, attended him; and during his whole life time hee was both most highly honoured by kings, and reuerenced by the common sort: and after his death his me- morie is perdurable. For all the bookes which he left in writing, are read amongst vs euen at this present; and we haue bene perswaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not onely prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets haue done) but also hath determined the time wherein those things should happen. And whereas other Pro- phets were accustomed to foretell aduersities, and for that occasion were disliked both by Prin- ces and their people, Daniel foretold them alwaies good successe: so that he hath drawne vnto him the good will of all men, by reason of those pleasing predictions that hee pronounced; and by the issues thereof, he hath obtained a testimonie of truth, and a reputation likewise of diuinity, and hath left vs certaine writings, by which, hee hath manifestly declared the immutabilitie and exact certaintie of his prophecies.

It is said, that being at Susa the Metropolitane Citie of Persia, at such time as hee walked a- broad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earthquake with a great noise: so that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon being sore troubled, hee fell vpon his face, and both his hands: at which time some one touched him; and commaunded him to stand vp, and to see that which should happen to his countrymen after diuerse ages. Being therefore raised vp right, there was a great ramme shewed vnto him, that had diuerse hornes, the last whereof was the greatest of all. Afterwards he looked towards the west, and perceiued a goat carried thorow the aire, that buttred at the ramme, and hauing encountered him twice, had bea- ten and trampled him vnder his feete. Thirdly, he saw a goat, in whose forehead there grew one great horne onely: which being broken, foure others brake out in stead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure winds of the world: He hath written also, that from them, there shall arise another little one also, which as God (who presented the vision to him) tolde him, being growne to perfection, should warre against the whole nation of the Iewes, and take the Citie by force, and confound the estate of the temple, and hinder the sacrifices, for one thousand two hundred ninetie and six daies.

Daniel writeth that he saw these things in the field of Susa, and hath declared that God him- selfe told him what that vision signified; which was, that the Ramme signified the kingdomes of the Persians, and the Medes: His hornes signified the kings that were to raigne in those king- domes; and that the last horne signified the last king, who should surpass all the rest in riches and glorie. That the goat signified, that there should come a certaine king among the Greekes, who should fight at two feuerall times with the Persian, and should overcome him in warre; and after-afterwards possesse the whole gouernment: And that by the great horne that grew in the front of the Goat, the first King was represented; and how that after he was taken away, foure other should spring thereout. And whereas euery one of these turned themselves toward the foure corners of the world, it was a signe that after the death of the first, he should haue foure successors, that should depart the kingdome betweene them: who neither should be his allies or children; yet such notwithstanding as should commaund the world for many yeares: That from them, there should arise a certaine King, that should oppose himselfe against the Hebrew Nation, and their lawes, and should ouerthrow their policie, spoile their temple, and be a let that for three yeares space the sacrifices should not be solemnized. Now so hath it happened, that our Nation hath bene so handled vnder Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseene, and hath written diuerse yeares before, all that which should happen.

At the same time Daniel wrote as touching the Emperie of the Romanes, how it should destroy our nation: and hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them vnto him; so that they who reade and consider those things that haue hapned, admire Daniel for the honour that God dignified him with, and find thereby that Epicures erre, who driue all diuine prouidence from humane life, and affirme that God gouerneth not the affaires of the world; or that the world is administred by a happie & incorruptible essence, which causeth all things to continue in their being: but say, that the world is mannaged by it selfe, by casualtie, without any conductor, or such a one as hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a soueraigne gouernour (as we see shippes destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the windes; and chariots that haue no driuers to conduct them, to beat one against another) euen so should it perish, and should ruinate it selfe by such an irregular motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I iudge that they are farre estraunged from the truth, that affirme that God hath no care of humane affaires; for if wee see that all things happen casually, then happen they not according to his prophecie. But I haue written hereof according as I haue found and read: and if any one will thinke otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long as him list.

Cyrus King of Persia dismisseth the Iewes from Babylon, and permitteth them to returne into their country, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

He first yeare of the raigne of Cyrus (which was the seuenth after that our nation was translated from Iudæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captiuitie & calamity of his poore afflicted people: & euen as he had foretold them before the destruction of the Citie, that after they had serued Nabuchodonosor and his posteritie for seuentie yeeres, he would againe restore them to their country wherein they were borne, where they should build a Temple, and enioy their former felicitie: so brought he it to passe. For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus; and made him write his letters throughout all Asia to this effect. *Thus saith the King Cyrus: Since the Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world; I am perswaded that it is he whom the Iewish nation doe adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was borne, and hath said that I shall build his temple in Ierusalem, which is in the countrey of Iudæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a booke of prophecie written by Isay, two hundredth & ten yeeres before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reueale these things vnto him, speaking to this effect. I will that Cyrus, whom I haue declared King ouer many nations, shall send my people backe into their country of Iudæa, & shall build my temple. These things did Isay foretell one hundredth & forty yeeres before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being rauished in admiration of the Maiesty of God) was surprisid with an affection & zeale to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Iewes that were in Babylon, & told them that he gaue the licence to returne into their country, & to reape the citie of Ierusalem, & erect the Temple of God; promising them that he himselfe would assist them. And to that effect he wrote vnto his gouernours, & princes of those countries that confined vpon Iudæa: charging them to contribute both gold & siluer toward the building of the temple, and to furnish them with cattell for the sacrifice. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two tribes of Juda & Beniamin, with all the Leuites and Priests departed thence, and repaired to Ierusalem: Natheliese diuers of the Iewes remained in Babylon; in that they were loath to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soone as they came vnto the Kings friends, they afforded them both fauour and aide, & furnished them with necessaries matter to build the temple, some of them with gold, other some with siluer, and the rest with a certaine number of oxen and horses. Thus paid they their vows vnto God, and offered the sacrifices according to the auncient custome, as if the citie had bin new builded againe, and the ancient seruite of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them backe also those vessels consecrated to God, which king Nabuchodonosor had sent vnto Babylon after he had spoiled the temple; and deliuered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to A-bassars hands, who should haue the custodie thereof, vntill the temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliuer the to the priests & princes of the people, to be restored againe to the seruite of the temple. He sent letters also to the gouernours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King of Sisine and Sarabasame, health. I haue permitted those Iewes that inhabit my country, to returne into their natie country, and to redifie their Citie, and erect the temple of God in Ierusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I haue also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, with expresse charge and authority, to lay the foundations of the same, and to build it sixtie cubits in height, and as many in bredth, making three Illes of hewen stone, and an other of such timber as the country affordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer sacrifice vnto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of all these things come out of my cofers. I haue also sent backe those vessels which Nabuchodonosor took out of the temple, and haue deliuered them to the treasurer Mithridates; and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, to bee conueyed to Ierusalem, and restored to the temple of God: the number whereof I haue hereunder subscribed. Fiftie lauers of gold, and foure hundredth of siluer; fiftie pots of gold, and foure hundredth of siluer; fiftie golden sieues, and fiftie hundredth of siluer; thirtie Ewers of gold, and three hundredth of siluer; thirtie great viols of gold, and two thousand foure hundredth of siluer; and besides all these, one thousand other great vessels*

CHAP. I.

Cyrus King of Persia dismisseth the Iewes from Babylon, and permitteth them to returne into their country, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

He first yeare of the raigne of Cyrus (which was the seuenth after that our nation was translated from Iudæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captiuitie & calamity of his poore afflicted people: & euen as he had foretold them before the destruction of the Citie, that after they had serued Nabuchodonosor and his posteritie for seuentie yeeres, he would againe restore them to their country wherein they were borne, where they should build a Temple; and enioy their former felicitie: so brought he it to passe. As soone as they came vnto the Kings friends, they afforded them both fauour and aide, & furnished them with necessarie matter to build the temple, some of them with gold, other some with siluer, and the rest with a certaine number of oxen and horses. Thus paid they their vows vnto God, and offered the sacrifices according to the auncient custome, as if the citie had bin newe builded againe, and the ancient seruice of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them backe also those vessels consecrated to God, which king Nabuchodonosor had sent vnto Babylon after he had spoiled the temple; and deliuered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to Assars hands, who should haue the custodie thereof, vntill the temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliuer them to the priests & princes of the people, to be restored againe to the seruice of the temple. He sent letters also to the gouernours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King of Sisine and Sarabazame, health. I haue permitted those Iewes that inhabit my country, to returne into their native country, and to reedifie their Citie, and erect the temple of God in Ierusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I haue also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, with expresse charge and authority, to lay the foundations of the same, and to build it sixtie cubits in height, and as many in bredth, making three Isles of hewen stone, and an other of such timber as the country affordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer sacrifice vnto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of all these things come out of my cofers. I haue also sent backe those vessels which Nabuchodonosor took out of the temple, and haue deliuered them to the treasurer Mithridates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, to bee conueyed to Ierusalem, and restored to the temple of God: the number whereof I haue hereunder subscribed. Fiftie lauers of gold, and foure hundredth of siluer; fiftie pots of gold, and foure hundredth of siluer; fiftie golden sieues, and fiftie hundredth of siluer; thirtie Ewers of gold, and three hundredth of siluer; thirtie great viols of gold, and two thousand foure hundredth of siluer; and besides all these, one thousand other great vessels

WHilest these men laid the foundations of the Temple, & were very affectionately busied about the building thereof, the nations that bordered vpon them, and in especiall the Chuteans (whom Salmanazar king of Assyria sent from Persia and Media to inhabit in Samaria, at such time as he translated the people of the ten tribes) incited the princes and governours, to interdict the Iewes from raising and building their citie, and reedifying the temple. Who corrupted with silver, sold their negligence, and delay to the Chuteans, which they used in those buildings. For Cyrus intending his other warres, was ignorant hereof, & hauing conducted his army against the Massagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finish his life. When as therefore Cambyles his sonne had obtained the kingdome, they of Syria and Phoenicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritanes wrote their letters to Cambyles in these rearmes. O King, thy seruants Rathimus the secretarie, Semelius the Scribe, & those men that are counsellors in Syria and Phoenicia, giue thee to vnderstand, that those Iewes that were led captiue into Babylon are returned back into this country, and doe build a wicked and rebellious citie, & repaire the places and walles of the same, and reedifie their temple likewise. Know therefore that if these things be permitted to be finished, that they will no more endure to be thy subiects and tributaries, but will oppose themselves against their kings, holding it more fit to command then to obey. Wee haue therefore thought good that whilst they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their temple, to write vnto your maiestic, to the intent you may not neglect to examine your fathers records, wherein you shall alwaies finde that the Iewes haue bene rebels, and enemies to their kings; and that their Citie hath been for this cause laid desolate vntill this present. Wee haue thought good to signifie thus much to your maiestic, which perhaps is vknowne vnto you, because that if this citie be once more reinhabited & inclosed with a wall, your way is shut vp from passing into Coelosyria and Phoenice.

CHAP. III.

Cambyles inhibiteth the Iewes to build the Temple.

Cambyles answered wherein he inhibiteth the Iewes from building the citie or temple.

When Cambyles had read this letter (in that he was by nature both wicked & malicious) he grew inwardly ielous & displeased at the contents thereof, and wrote back againe after this manner. The King Cambyles to Rathimus the secretarie, of his casuall euents, and Beslem & Semelius scribes, and to all his other counsellors & inhabitants in Samaria & Phoenicia, health. Hauing read your letters, I haue commanded the records of mine ancestors to be examined, and I finde that the Citie of Ierusalem hath bin alwaies enemy to their kings, and that the inhabitants thereof haue alwaies raised sedition and wars. I haue likewise found, that their kings haue bin mightie, and violent, and that they haue vexed Syria & Phoenicia with continuall tributes. For this cause I haue ordained, that the Iewes shall not be permitted to reedifie their Citie, for feare least their malice should augment by such occasion which they haue continually used against their kings. Incontinently after the receipt and reading of these letters, Rathimus and the scribe Semelius, and those of their faction, tooke their horse and rode hastily to Ierusalem, leading with them a great number of people, prohibiting the Iewes from the building either of their Citie or Temple. Thus was this worke interrupted vntill the second yeere of the raigne of Darius king

And after the death of Cambyles, the Magi held the Empire of the Persians for the space of one yeere being taken away, the seven families of Persia made Darius (the sonne of Hystaspis) king.

CHAP. III.

Darius the sonne of Hystaspis causeth the Temple to be builded.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 9. al. chap. 4. Darius the son of Hystaspis made emperor of the Persians.

His Darius, during the time that hee liued a private life, made a vow vnto God, that if hee obtained the kingdome, hee would send backe vnto the temple of Ierusalem all those vessels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the same time, Zorobabel, who was appointed gouernour ouer the captiue Iewes, came vnto him from Ierusalem. For he was the kings ancient friend; for which cause he with other two were chosen to bee of his guard, & obtained thereby that honor which he expected. The first yeere of the raigne of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pompe, & magnificence, both those of his household, as they also that were his gouernors & princes of Media and Persia, and the commanders in India confining vpon Aethiopia, with all the chieftaines of his army, in one hundredth, twenty and seven provinces. Now after they had made great cheere, and were full of wine, they departed each of them vnto their lodgings, to betake themselves to rest. But king Darius laid in his bed, reposed very little all the night long, but passed the time without sleepe: for which cause seeing hee could take no rest, he began to deuise & discoure with three of his guard, promising him that should most truly and aptly answer those questions that hee should demand, to grant him licence in way of reward to weare a purple garment, & to drinke in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, and to ride on a chariot harnessed with gold, & to beare the Tiar or linnen wreath, and weare a golden chaine about his necke, and sit in the next place vnto the king; and should likewise be called his kinsman in regard of his wisdom. After hee had made these large promises, hee demanded of the first, whether wine were the strongest? of the second, whether the king were stronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the most strongest of the three? And as soone as hee had deliuered them these questions to deliberate vpon, he laid him downe to rest. Vpon the next morrow he sent for the princes, chieftaines, and gouernours of Persia & Media, and afterwards sitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accustomed to determine the differents among his subiects, hee commanded those three yong men of his guard in the presence of that princely assistance, publickly to yeeld the resolution of those questions he had proposed vnto them.

Ed. 5. 6. Darius vowed to send the sacred vessels to Ierusalem. Zorobabel.

Darius propounded three questions to three of his guard. 3. Ed. 4.

Whereupon, the first of them began after this manner to expresse the force of wine. Noble princes, when I consider the force of wine, I find nothing that may surmount the same. For wine entangleth and deceiveth the vnderstanding, and maketh the princes vnderstanding like to the poore mans, who is abandoned; and giueth the slaue that freedome in discourse, which appertaineth to men of greatest libertie: It maketh the poore resemble the rich: It changeth and transformeth the soule, asswageth the miserable mans griefe, and maketh the indebted forget their bonds, and to thinke themselves very rich; so that they ruminat on no abiect things, but talke of talents, and such things as appertaine vnto the richer sort: it causeth them to lose all apprehension both of princes and kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth men against their greatest friends, and maketh them suppose their nearest wellwillers to be strangers; and when the wine concocted by night & sleepe hath forsaken them, they rise and know not what things they haue committed in their drunkennesse.

The first expreth the power of wine.

When the first of them had in this sort declared his resolution, as touching wine, he was silent, and the next began to speake of the kings force, shewing that it was of mightie consequence, and more powerful then any other thing that seemeth to haue force and intelligence; and thus handled hee the subiect of his demonstration. Kings (saith hee) haue dominion ouer men, who haue the ability to enforce the earth, and at their pleasure can command the sea to serue them: Kings haue power and dominion ouer those men who master and command the vncamed and mightiest creatures; it therefore appeareth that their force and puissance exceedeth all these. If they command their subiects to wage warre, and to expose themselves to danger, they are obedient; and if they send them out against their enemies, they willingly obey them by reason of their force: By their ordinance they leuel mountaines, beate downe walles, and race towers. And if they command their subjects to kill or to be killed, they resist not, for feare that they should be made to transgresse the kings commandement. When they haue obtained the victorie, all the glorie and profit of the warre redoundeth vnto the king. They likewise which beare no armes, but intend the tillage of the earth, after they haue traualled and supported all the toyle of their tillage, reape and gather the fruits, to the end to pay the King his tribute: And if he will or command any thing, it must needly bee performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore, when the king is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enioy his pleasant and delightful rest, during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were tied vnto him, throw the feare and awe they haue of him: For not one of them dare forsake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their owne affaires, but intend those seruices only, which bee thinketh necessarie, which is the guard of his person. Who therefore will not esteeme the kings forces to be greater then any others: since so many people obey him in whatsoever, and whensoever he commandeth?

Zorobabel, the third, expresseth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palme vnto truth.

After he had spoken to this effect, Zorobabel, who was the third, began to iustifie in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner. True it is, that winchath much force, and no lesse true that all men obey the king, yet farre more mightie is the power of a woman. For by a woman the king was bred, and brought into this world, and those men that plant the vineyards where wines doe grow, are borne and nourished by women; and generally there is not any thing which wee enioy not by them. For they weaue vs garments, they haue the care and custodie of our houses; neither is it possible for vs to bee seuered from women. Yea, they that possess much gold and abundance of siluer, and other things of great and inestimable price; onely vpon the sight of a faire woman forsake all these things, and will follow after the beauty which they behold, & for the onely possession thereof, content themselves to lose all things. We forsake likewise our father and mother, and the country that hath bred vs, and forget our friends for our wiues sake; yea wee will willingly content our selues to die with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonstration of the most mighty power of a woman. For whatsoever we trauell for, all the paines that we endure both by land and sea, to the intent we may reape some fruits of our labours, doe we not carrie all this to giue vnto our wiues, as vnto those who are our mistresses? I haue seene the king likewise, who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the eare, by Apame the daughter of Rhaphaces his concubine, and patiently endure when she tooke the diademe from his head, and set it on her owne. When she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, he was displeased: and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his affections to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilst the Princes in way of admiration beheld one another, hee began to discourse of truth, saying: I haue alreadie declared what the force of women is; yet notwithstanding both the king and they are more feeble then truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mightie, the heauen likewise of an immeasurable height, and the sunne of vnspokeable celeritie; & whereas the will of God both gouerneth and moueth these things (because God is iust and true) it therefore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of all things; against which, iniustice may no waies preuaile. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seeme to be of valew, yet are they mortall and of little continuance: but truth is immortall and euermore lasting. Moreover, all those things which we receiue thereby, are neither mortall, neither subject to the iniuries of time, fortune, or alteration; but continue iust, and lawfull, and separated from all stain of iniustice. When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse: Whereupon, all the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most valew, and that onely veritie had an immutable force, and an indeterminable continuance. Whereupon the king commanded him to aske what he would, as touching that which hee had promised to giue, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wife, and best learned amongst the rest. For (said he) thou shalt sit henceforth next vnto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

Zorobabel obtained both praise & great rewards by his good discourse. Darius being put in memory of his vow, commandeth that the temple should be restored. Herod & Rufinus, chap. 4.

When the king had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vowe that the king had made, if so be at any time hee obtained the kingdom: namely, that he would build Ierusalem, and the temple of God, and restore those vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O king is my request which you permitted me to aske, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was iudged wise and well lettered by you. The king tooke great pleasure at these words of his, and arising from his throne kissed him. He wrote also vnto his gouernours and princes, that they should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the temple. Moreover he sent letters to them of Syria and Phoenicia,

*A*lexis, commanding them to cut downe the Cedars of Libanus, and to send them to Ierusalem towards the building of the citie, publishing a lawe that all Iewes should bee made free, if so be they would resort into Iudaea, forbidding all commissaries & Princes, to impose any charge vpon the Iewes, for the necessities of the kingdome, permitting that all the country which they might occupy, might be inhabited by them, and exempt from tributes: commanding the Idumians, Samaritans, and Cosyrians to restore those lands vnto the Iewes which they vnlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And besides that, to deliuer them in way of contribution five talents of siluer towards the building of the temple, permitting them to offer their ordinarie sacrifice. He likewise commanded that all the necessaries and vestments, which either the high Priest, or the ordinarie sacrificers vsed in the seruice of God, should bee furnished at his charges. He willed also that the Leuites should haue instruments of Musicke deliuered vnto them, to praise God with; and that certaine portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the Citie, and the temple. Moreover he allowed them a certaine summe of money euery year for their ordinarie maintenance. After this, he sent backe all those vessels which Cyrus before time had resolved to restore vnto Ierusalem.

When Zorobabel had obtained these things abouenamed at the kings hands, he issued out of the palace, and lifting vp his eyes vnto heauen, he began to giue God thanks for the wisdom and victorie hee had granted him, and for the good successe he had giuen him in Darius presence. For (said he) O Lord, if thou hadst not bene fauourable vnto me, I had not obtained it. After he had at this time, & in this sort giuen thanks for the present; and praised God to shew himselfe alwaies fauourable hereafter, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countrymen what good newes hee had receiued from the King: who hearing the same, gaue God thanks also, who had restored them once more to the possession of that country wherein they were borne: and they fell to feasting and banquetting for seuen daies space, for the restoring vnto their country, as if they had solemnized the feasts of their birth daies. Anon after they made choise of those gouernors & common sort, that (with their wiues, their children and horses) should returne vnto Ierusalem, who by the assistance of Darius conuoy, performed their iourney to Ierusalem with ioy and consolation; playing on their Psalteries, Flutes, and Cymbals; and were after this manner conducted on their way, with delight, by the number of those Iewes that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward, being a certaine and determinate number of euery family. I haue not thought it meet to repeat these families name by name, for feare I should confound my storie, & least the readers should any waies be distracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithstanding, the whole number of those that went, and were about twelue yeares olde of the tribes of Juda & Beniamin, were foure millions, sixe hundred, twenty and eight thousand. There were likewise foure thousand and secentie Leuites: And of their wiues and children together, fortie thousand, seuen hundred, fortie and two. Besides these, there were of singers of the tribe of Leui, one hundred, twentie and eight; of porters, one hundred and ten; and of sacred seruants three hundred, twenty and two. There were certaine others likewise, that pretended that they were of the race of the Israelites, yet could not they giue testimony of their descent; the number of whom were six hundred fifty & two. Of the number of the priests, they that had espoused wiues (whose genealogie could not bee deriued, and who were not found also in the genealogies of the Priests and Leuites) they were about fise hundred, twenty & fise. The multitude of seruants that followed or attended on them, were seuen thousand, three hundred, thirtie and seuen. There were also two hundred, fortie and fise fingers of men and women: foure hundred, thirtie and fise Camels; and fise hundred, twenty and fise other beasts to beare their carriage. The conductor of this about named multitude, was Zorobabel the sonne of Salathiel; descended of Danids line, and of the tribe of Juda; and Iesus the sonne of Iosedech the high priest: besides which were Mardochaus and Serebous, who were chosen by the people to be their gouernors, who contributed one hundred pounds of gold, and fise hundred of siluer. Thus the priests and Leuites, and a part of all the people of the Iewes which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell at Ierusalem; the other part of them following a little after returned euery one into his own country.

There erected they an Altar in the same place, where before time it was builded, to the end they might offer lawfull sacrifices thereon, according to Moses law: in which action of theirs: they yeelded little content to their neighbour Nations, who in generall were incensed against them. They celebrated also at that time the feast of tabernacles, according as the law-mosaic had ordained: afterwards they offered oblations, and continuall sacrifices, observing then Sabbath and many solemnities. And they that had made any vows, performed the same; and sacrificed from the new-moone vntill the eleventh month. After this they began to build the temple; and gathered great summes of money to the Jewes of Syria, and Galilee; and gave strangers their ordinarie diet; who brought them stone and timber. For it was an easie matter for the Sidonians and Canaanites well pleasing vnto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to bind it, and gathering it together in rafters to ship it, and land it at the port of Ioppa. For Cyrus had before time given them that commandement; and now the second time they were enjoyned thereto by Darius.

The second yeere after their arrivall in Ierusalem, the Jewes assembled together in the second month; and the building of the temple went forward; so that having laid the foundation thereof in the first day of December, they builded vpon the same, the second yeere. Over this worke those Levites that were aboute twentye yeeres of age, were overseers: with them also was Iesus, and his sonnes and brothers joynd, and Zalmiel the brother of Iuda the sonne of Amiadab, and his sonnes. And thorow the diligence that those overseers of the temple used, it was sooner finished, then it was expected. As soone as the sanctuary was builded, the Priests apparelled in their accustomed habits, and the Levites; and the sonnes of Asaph also, and with trumpets praised God, according as David first of all had set downe the manner of his service. The priests and Levites with the elders of the tribes (calling vnto their minds how great and precious the first temple was, and beholding that which was builded vpon the present, farre inferiour to the precedent, and perceiving how much the ancient wealth and dignitie of the temple was abated, they were confuted thereat, and being vnable to overcome their passion, they burst out into lamentations and teares. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any estimate or mention of the former temple, they tormented not themselves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they vpon the difference and bignesse betwixt the present and that which stood in times past: yet notwithstanding the elders lamented, and the priests complained, that the new erected Temple was farre lesse then the former; yet the noise of the trumpets drowned their laments, and the ioyfull applauses of the people their mourninges.

The Samaritans hearing the noise of the trumpets, ranne out to know the cause thereof; in that they were lewdly affected towards the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin; and vnderstanding that the Jewes which were returned from Babylon had reedified the temple, they addressed themselves to Zorobabel and Iesus, & to the chiefe gouernours of the families, requiring them that it might bee lawfull for them to repaire the temple with them; and to haue part in the building thereof. For (said they) we honour God no lesse then you, we pray vnto him and adore him; wee conforme ourselves to your customes, euer since the time that Samarazar king of Assyria remoued vs out of Chuthea and Media hither. To these demands of theirs, Zorobabel and Iesus the high priest and the gouernours of the tribes answered, that it was impossible for them to admit their assistance in the building of the temple, for that they had receiued their first commandement from Cyrus to performe the same, and afterwards from Darius: notwithstanding they gaue the licence to adore therein, offering them that the temple should bee common to both, if they pleased: yet not accessible to all other nations, that would repaire thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for so were the Samaritans called) hearing this answer, were fore offended; and perswaded the other nations of Syria to require their princes (who continued their authoritie since the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyes time) to hinder the building of the temple; and to destroy the Jewes, who were so intent and busie in their worke. Whereupon Sisin gouernour in Syria and Phoenicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came vnto Ierusalem; and demanded of the chieftaines of the Jewes, by whose permission they builded the temple, which rather seemed to be a fort then a temple, and for what cause they fortified their Citie with gates and so strong walles? Zorobabel and Iesus the high Priest answered, that they were the seruants of the liuing God, and that their temple had bene built by one of their kings, who was opulent & surpassed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable estimation (by reason their fathers had committed impietie against God) Nabuchadonisor king of Babylon and Chaldaea, hauing taken the Citie by force destroyed the same; and after he had spoyled the citie he burned it, and transported the people captiue into Babylon.

OF THE IEWES. THE XI. BOOKE.

The years of the world 3444. before Christ's Nativity, 520. 1. E. d. 5.

A But after that Cyrus king of Persia had obtained the kingdom of Babylon, he commaunded by his expresse letters sealed with his roiall seale, that they should reedifie the temple, and ordained that all that which Nabuchadonisor caried from thence, as well gifts as vessels, should be deliuered to Zorobabel and the Treasurer Mithridates, to be conuaid to Ierusalem, and be placed againe in the temple, as soone as it should be builded. And he commanded also, that it should be presently reedified, willing Abassar to repaire to Ierusalem, and giue order for all that which was requisite; who resorting thither as soone as hee had receiued Cyrus letters, did speedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward vntill this present it hath bene continued; but the subtiltie and malignitie of their enemie had wrought so much, that as yet it remained imperfect. If therefore please you, and you thinke it good, signifie that you heare, by your letters to Darius, to beend that examining the registers of the kings, he may find that we are not faultie in any thing of that which we haue said. When Zorobabel and Iesus had answered to this effect; Sisin and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, vntill such time as they had certified Darius hereof: for which cause they wrote vnto him presently. Hereupon the Jewes were much discomforted & troubled, fearing least the king should change his mind in respect of the building of Ierusalem & the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongst them) beganne to perswade them, willing them to feare no disaster from the Persians, because God had assured them: for which cause the people gaue credit to the Prophets; & diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

When the Samaritans had in this sort written to Darius, and accused the Jewes vnto him for fortifying their Citie, and reedifying their Temple, & how it seemed to be rather a fort, then some sacred place, and had further alledged that it would be no profit vnto him, and moreover had produced Cambyes letters, by which they were forbidden to build the temple; hee vnderstood that the reestablishment of Ierusalem stood not with the securitie of his state. But when he had read Sisin letters and his associates, he commaunded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the kings should be searched, how the matter had past; and there was found in Ecbatane a Citie of the Medes, in a tower a certaine booke, in which these things were written. The first yeere of the raigne of Cyrus, commandement was giuen to build the temple of Ierusalem, and the altar therein: It was likewise decreed, that the height of the Temple should bee sixtie cubits, and the breadth as many; three stories of hewed stone, and one story of the wood of that countrey: and it was ordained that the expence of that building should be deducted out of the kings reuenues.

Moreover he commaunded, that restitution should be made vnto the inhabitants of Ierusalem, of those vessels that were taken away by Nabuchadonisor, and caried away to Babylon: And the commission to effect all these things was giuen to Abassar gouernour of Syria and Phoenicia; and his companions, to the end that they might depart from these places, and the Jewes might bee permitted to build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile & building should be gathered out of the tributes of his countries, and that they should furnish the Jewes with buls, weathers, lambes, goates, flower, oyle, and wine, and all other things which the Priests should thinke meet to offer sacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preservation of the King of Persia: commaunding that they that should transgresse or contradict this commandement of his, should be laid hold on, and hanged on a gibbet, & that their goods should be confiscate to the kings vs. Moreover, he besought God; that if any man went about to hinder the building of the temple, that he would punish him and strike him, and restraine his wickednesse thereby. When Darius had found these things written in his Panchartes and Chronicles, he wrote back to Sisin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Sisin, and Sarabazan, with their associates; health. Hauing found amongst the memorialls of Cyrus the copy of your misliue; I haue sent it you, and my pleasure is that the contents thereof be executed. Fare you well.

Sisin and his associates beeing certified of the kings pleasure, resolved themselves conformably to execute the same: and taking the care of the sacred buildings vpon them, they assisted the Princes & Magistrates of the Jewes in such sort, as the building of the Temple was finished with great diligence, by the instigation of the Prophets Aggeus and Zachary, according to Gods commandement, and by the directions of the kings Cyrus and Darius; so that it was finished within 7 yeeres. In the ninth yeere of the raigne of Darius, and the three and twenty of the eleventh moneth, called by vs Ader, and by the Macedonians Disfre; the Priests and Levites, and all the rest of the people offered sacrifices for the renovation of their former felicity, after their captiuitie; and for their new temple also: sacrificing one hundred bulles, two hundred sheepe, foure hundred lambes, twelue goates, according to the number of the twelue tribes of Israel; and for the finnes

Xerxes fauoureth the Iewes.

Now when the feast of vnleauened bread (which is the feast of Easter) drew neere, in the first moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrewes, all the people of the townes round about Ierusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the feast; purifying both themselves, their wiues, and children, according to the ordinance of their forefathers: And after they had solemnized the feast called Easter, or the Pasche in the 14 moone, they banquetted for seuen daies space, sparing no cost how great soeuer it were. They offered burnt offerings also, & sacrifices of thanksgiving, acknowledging Gods goodnesse that had brought them home into their native Countrey, to liue according to the lawes of their forefathers, and had made the gracious in the King of Persiaes eyes. Thus dwelled they in Ierusalem in all ioy, sacrificing and seruing God with great affection, and liuing vnder the gouernment of their nobilitie. For the chiefest authoritie remained in the high Priests, vntill the Assmonians obtained the kingdom: for before the captiuitie of Babylon, they were vnder the gouernment of kings, who began from Saul and Damids times, about some five hundred, thirtie, two yeeres, sixe moneths, and tenne daies; & before their Kings certaine Gouernours called Iudges raigned: and vnder this sort of policie liued they more then five hundred yeeres; from the death of Moses and Iosuah. See here the estate of the Iewes deliuered from their captiuitie, during the daies of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mightie and malicious aduersaries, & did them many mischiefs, trusting in their riches, and pretending themselves to be the Persians kinsmen, because their originall proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that tribute, which the king had commaunded them to disburse vnto the Iewes to make their sacrifices, and had their Gouernours likewise affectionate and forward to further their malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them mischiefe, either in themselves, or by others. For which cause, the Iewes determined to send Embassadors vnto king Darius, to accuse the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and foure others were sent. As soone therefore as the king vnderstood by these Embassadors, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritanes, hee dispatched his letters, and addressed them to the Gouernours and Councell of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. King Darius to Tangara & Sambaba Gouernours of Samaria, to Sadrach and Babelon, and to their companions our seruants being in Samaria, health. Zorobabel, Anani, As, and Mardocheus, Embassadors in the behalfe of the Iewes, accuse you to be perturbors of the building of their temple; alleadging, that you refuse to discharge that, which by my decree you ought to furnish them with, for the charge of the sacrifices. My will is therefore, that vpon the sight of these letters, you deliuer out of the roiall treasure in Samaria, appointed for the tributes, all that which shall be necessary for the to performe their sacrifices, vpon the request of the Priests, to the intent they let passe no day without sacrifice and praier vnto God for mee, and for the Persians. This was the contents of his letter.

CHAP. V.

The beneficence of Xerxes, Darius sonne, towards the Iewes.

After Darius death, his sonne Xerxes succeeded him, not onely as heire in the gouernment of his kingdom, but also as successor vnto his pietie & deuotion towards God: for he no waies changed those institutions of his fathers that concerned religious seruice, but with great beneuolence fauoured all the Iewes. During his reigne Iosachim the sonne of Iesus was high Priest: Amongst the also that remained in Babylon, there liued a high priest with the Iewes in that place called Efdras; a iust man, and one of great reputation amongst the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the lawes of Moses, hee obtained great friendship with the king. This man intending (with certaine other Iewes of Babylon) to make his repaire vnto Ierusalem, beought the king that he would vouchsafe to bestow his letters of commendations to the Gouernours of Syria in his behalfe. Whereupon the king wrote his letters pattents of grace, certifying his fauor towards Efdras, to the princes in those parts, to this effect: Xerxes king of kings, to Efdras the high Priest, and Reader of the diuine law, health. It is decreed by me and euen other of my Councell, that whosoever in my kingdom of the Israelites, their Priests, or Leuites

A uites will repaire with thee vnto Ierusalem, hee may freely performe the same with my good licence, and reuise Iudaea according to the law of God; bearing with you those presents vnto the God of Israel, which both I and my friends haue vowed. I likewise giue thee licence to take with thee all the gold and siluer whatsoeuer, that any of thy nation liuing here in Babylon will offer vnto God, to buy offerings to be sacrificed vpon the altar of thy GOD: and to make whatsoeuer vessels of gold or siluer, which either thou or thy brethren shall thinke meet. Those sacred vessels also which are giuen thee, thou shalt dedicate vnto thy God, and if there be ought else requisite in this behalfe, that according to thy wisdom shall thou provide; & the charges shalt thou receive out of my treasure. I haue also commaunded thee to the Treasurers of Syria and Phoenicia; and haue written to them, that whatsoever Efdras the Priest and Reader of the law of GOD shall require, they shall presently deliuer it him: And to the end that God may be fauourable to me and my children, my will is, that a hundred measures of wheate be giuen vnto God according to the law. I commaund you also that are Magistrates, that you exact nothing, neither impose any taxations on the Priests, Leuites, sacred singing men, porters, or holy officers: But thou Efdras according to the wisdom giuen thee from aboue, shalt appoint Iudges, who shall in Syria and Phoenicia execute iustice vnto the people, according to the science of the law. Teach thou likewise freely all such as are ignorant, so that whosoever violateth either Gods or the Kings law, he may be fined, or else condemned to death, as not sinning thorow ignorance, but of contumacie. Farewell.

When Efdras had receiued this letter, he was wonderfully contented, and beganne to adore God, confessing openly that it was he, who was the author of that fauour hee had receiued at the kings hands: for which cause he said, that the onely thanksgiving appertained to him. And after he had read this letter vnto the Iewes that were at that time resident in Babylon, hee kept the originall, but sent the copy to all those of his nation, being in the country of the Medes: who vnderstanding of the kings affection towards God, and his fauour towards Efdras, were very ioyfull; and diuers amongst them tooke their goods and came vnto Babylon, desiring to returne to Ierusalem: but all the rest of the Israelites would not abandon or leaue their quiet dwelling there. For which cause it came to passe; that two tribes were vnder the obedience of the Romans in Asia and Europe: but the tenne Tribes were on the other side of Euphrates, euen vntill this day; being many infinites of thousands, whose number may not be comprehended. With Efdras there departed a great number of Priests, Leuits, porters, singing men, and seruants of the temple. Now after that hee had assembled those of the captiuitie, that inhabited on this side Euphrates, and sojourned there three daies, he commaunded them to solemnize a fast, and to pray vnto God for his preservation, and that no euill might happen vnto him; and that neither their enemies nor any other might doe them any violence. For Efdras had foretold the king that GOD would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no conuoy of horsemen at his hand for his securitie. After that they had recommended themselves vnto God, they set forward on their way, the twelfth day of the first moneth of the seventh yeere of the reigne of Xerxes, and arriued in Ierusalem in the first moneth of the same yeere. Whereupon, he incontinently presented vnto the Treasurers (who were of the race of the Priests) the siluer that was consecrated, namely, fixe hundred and fiftie talents, of siluer vessell a hundred talents, of vessell of gold twentie talents, of brazen vessell (more precious then gold) wayng twelue talents. These were the presents of the king and his friends, and of the Israelites that dwelt in Babylon.

When Efdras had deliuered these about named presents vnto the hands of the Priests, he offered burnt offerings vnto God, according to the law, namely, twelue bulles for the publique conservation of the people, 72 rammes and lambes, and twelue goates for the expiation of sin. And after them he deliuered the kings letters to his Princes and Gouernours in Coelosyria and Phoenicia: who being constrained to execute that which was enioyned them by the king, honored the nation of the Iewes, & supplied them euery waies in their necessities. This counsaile had Efdras himselfe giuen of their departure. But in my opinion God (hauing regard of his wisdom and integrity) did happily aduance his deliberation.

Not long after this, there came certaine men vnto him, complaining that some of the people, Priests, and Leuites had transgressed against the policie, and broken the lawes of the Countrey; for that they had espoused certaine strange women, and confounded the race of the Priests: requiring him that hee would haue an inward regard to Gods ordinances, for feare lest hee (conceiuing a generall hatred against them all) should send them anew some grievous calamities. For which cause Efdras deuoured with sorrow; incontinently rent his clothes, and tore his haire; and gence therein. After he had spoken to this effect, he gaue order that the Gouvernours should take the measure of the wall, and distribute the taske amongst the people, according to the burroughs and townes, and according to euerie mans ability: and after hee had promised to imploy both himselfe, and all his family therein, he dismissed the assembly. The ardent care in building the walls of Ierusalem.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Coelosyria, vnderstanding the wall was raised, with such haste and diligence, were sore aggrieved, & resolved with themselves to lie in ambush, and to hinder them in their deliberations; so that they slew diuers Iewes, and sought the meanes likewise to murder Nehemias himselfe: and hauing hired certaine strangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in waite for him. They bred also a feare and trouble amongst them, by spreading certaine rumors, that diuers nations intended to make war against them: by which reports (being too much distracted) they desisted somewhat in the prosecution of their building. Yet none of these things could weaken Nehemias diligence or resolution, but that (keeping a court of guard round about him) he instantly prosecuted his purpose, setting light by all occurrents; so great was his affection to accomplish his intent. And for that cause did he carefully and intently stand vpon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he believed that after his departure the Iewes would not finish the building of the wall. He commanded afterwards, that the workmen in their trauell should haue their furnitures fast by them, so that both Macons and labourers carried their swords.

Moreover, he gaue order that they should haue their targets by them; and hee placed certaine trumpeters, some five hundred foote distant the one from the other, charging them that as soone as they discovered the enemy from any part, they should incontinently sound the allarum, and giue notice vnto the people to arme themselves, and prepare for the fight, for feare they should be surprisid and found naked. He himselfe also walked the round, about the Cittie by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or sleeping at his pleasure, but onely for necessitie sake; and this labour endured he for the space of two yeeres, and three months: for the wall of Ierusalem was builded againe in that time, in the eight and twentieth yeere of the raigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the Cittie was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered sacrifices vnto God, & spent eight daies in feasting. When the rumor was spread abroad that this building was finished, the inhabitants of Syria were sore displeased. But Nehemias perceiuing that the Cittie was weakelie manned, be sought the Priests & Leuites to forsake their dwellings without the Cittie, & to come and dwell within, and to that intent hee builded them houses vpon his owne charge. Hecordained likewise, that they that intended their husbandry, should bring the tenths of their fruits vnto Ierusalem, to the intent that the Priests and Leuites by enioying their continuall maintenance, might intermit no time in the seruice of God: wherein hee was willinglie obeyed. By this meanes, the Cittie of Ierusalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably executed diuers other worthy actions deseruing praise, he died at such time as he was laden with age. He was a man of a good nature, iust & highly affectionated towards his country: he left the City of Ierusalem incompassed with a wall, for a perpetuall memorie of his loue vnto his country. All these things hapned during the raigne of Xerxes.

FTER the death of Xerxes, the kingdome fell to Cyrus his sonne, vvho by the Grecians was called Artaxerxes. Vnder his gouernment all the race of the Iewes, both men, women and children, were in danger to be vterly exterminated: the cause whereof I will heereafter declare. But first of all it behoueth me to speak somewhat of the king, and to declare how it came to passe, that hee married an Hebrew woman of the bloud royall, by whose meanes (as it is said) our nation was preserved. After that Artaxerxes had taken the kingdome vpon him, and established Gouvernours ouer one hundred and seauen and twenty prouinces, from India as farre as Ethiopia: in the third yeere of his raigne, hee entertained and feasted all his friends with great magnificence, the nations of Persia likewise with their Gouvernours

A (according as it became a king so opulent, who was prepared for one hundred and eightie daies to make shew of his wealth and bountie.) He feasted after this, for the space of 7. dayes the Embassadors of all nations in his Citie of Susa: and the setting forth of the banquet was such, as ensueeth. Hee fate in a tent, whose pillars were of golde and siluer, couered with linnen and scarlet vailes, which were of that greatesse, that diuers thousands of men might take their refection therein. All the eaters were serued in vessels of golde, enriched with precious stones, very glorious to behold. The King likewise commanded his seruants (that attended the feast) that they should enforce no man to drinke, by filling continually, according to the manner of the Persians, but to permit euerie one of the guests to drinke according to his discretion. He sent also thorowout all the country, commanding a cessation from all labour, and that euerie one should make holiday

B for many daies in honour of his royalty. The Queene Vasthi also made a banquet vnto her women in the royall palace. Now whereas the king was desirous to shew the maiestic of his queene to those he had inuited, he sent vnto her, commanding her to resort vnto the banquet in more roiall manner than the rest of her attendants: but shee too curiously tied to the obseruation of the law of the Persians (which forbiddeth women to be seene by strangers) went not vnto the King: and notwithstanding he sent his Eunuques diuers times vnto her, yet persisted shee in her refusal to come vnto him. Whereupon the king (moued with displeasure) gaue over his banquet, & arising thereto hee called vnto him his seuen counsellors, to whom (according to the vse of the Persians) it belonged to expound the lawes; and accused his wife, telling them how grieuouly hee had been wronged by her, for that being sent for by him diuers times to accompany him at

C his banquet, shee had euery way refused to obey him: He therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what punishment appertained to her. One amongst them called Marthais answered, that the iniurie was not onely offered vnto him, but to all the Persians: who being after that manner despised by their wiues, were like to passe their liues ignominiously, for that no one of them would acknowledge dutie towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queens disobedience, which she shewed towards him, who was the gouernour ouer all. Whereupon hee concluded, that she that had thus dishonored him, should be grieuouly punished: which done, he thought it meet that this ordinance of the kings might be published thorow all nations, that Queene Vasthi should be separated from his bed, and another woman chosen in her place. But the king, who vehemently loued her, and could hardly endure to be separated from her, knowing

D that he could not keepe her contrarie to law, was wholly deuoured in sorrow, for that hee might not be master of that which hee desired. Which when his familiars perceiued, they counselled him to forget the memory & loue of a woman so vnprofitable, & to send and seeke out thorow all his countries for the fairest woman amongst them, whom he might chooseth and take to wife, that surpassed all others in beautie; for that by the interuiew & companie of an other woman, the great affection which he bare vnto Vasthi, might be extinguished. The king allowing and ratifying this counsaile of theirs, sent out certaine messengers and deputies, commanding them to bring vnto his presence the fairest virgins that were to be found in his kingdome: when as therefore they had assembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young orphelin (without either father or mother) who was brought vp vnder her vncle (whose name was Mardocheus) of the tribe

E of Beniamin, and one of the greatest men amongst the Iewes. It came to passe, that this Ester (for such was her name) was iudged to be the fairest amongst the rest, who for her amiable countenance made all men to stand at gaze to behold her. Shee therefore was deliuered in charge vnto one of the Eunuques, who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was possible, decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the custome of noble women; and after this manner were foure hundred virgins entertained for the space of fixe moneths. Now when he that was put in trust with this commission, thought these virgins to be sufficiently prepared, and that they deserued to approche the princes bed, he sent euerie day one vnto the king, to keepe him company: who after some embraces sent her presently backe againe vnto the Eunuch. But when as Ester came vnto his presence, hee felted his affection on her more then on all the rest, and being surprisid with her loue, hee tooke her for his lawfull wife: and the nuptials were solemnlie celebrated in the seuenth yeere of his raigne, and in the twelfth moneth called by vs Adar, and generally Februarie: and he sent posts thorow all his kingdomes to proclaime a feast in honour of his marriage: he himselfe also feasted the Persians, and Medes, and the Princes of the nations, for a whole moneths space for the same cause. At such time as Ester entred into the royall palace, he set a diademe vpon her head, and so liued with her, that he neuer questioned with her either of her birth, or nation. where euerie day he walked before the palace gate, enquiring how Ester did: for that hee loued her as deere as if shee had bene his own naturall daughter. Now the king had made a law that no man should approche his presence, except he were called, during the time that he was in his throne; & round about his seat their stood certain officers with their axes, ready to punish those, who being vncalled should attempt to approche the throne. The king himselfe late aloft, and holding in his hand a golden scepter, whensoever he intended to saue the life of any one that approached his throne vncalled, hee stretched forth the same and touched him therewith: who being thus touched by these meanes auoyded the penaltie of death. And as touching these things wee haue sufficiently spoken in this place.

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodestes, two of the kings Eunuches, had conspired against him; Barmabazus, who was of the Hebrew nation & one of their seruants, disclosing their treason, discovered it to the Queenes vnckle Mardocheus, who by her meanes made the king priuie to their conspiracie. Who fore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination, and after he had commanded them to be executed on the gibbet, he for that time gaue no recogni-pence to Mardocheus for the safegard of his life: hee onely commanded his name to be registred and chronicled in his commentaries, commaunding that hee should attend in the palace, and be esteemed for one of the kings most inward friends. Now as often as Aman (the sonne of Amadath an Amalechite) came vnto the palace to visite the king, all those that were either Persians or strangers (according to the kings especiall direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus shewed him no honor (both by reason of that vpright iudgement that was in him, as also for that the lawes of the Jewes forbade the same. Which when Aman had obserued, hee demaund d whence he was? and vnderstanding that he was a Jew, he was much displeased, laying in himself, that the Persians who were of freer condition, cast themselves prostrate before him, and he that was but a slaue disdained to do the like. Intending therefore to reuenge himself on Mardocheus, he thought it not sufficient to procure his punishment at the kings hands, but resolu'd wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capitall enemy of the Jewes, by reason that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his descent, had bin wholly ruined by them.) For which cause, hee addressed himselfe vnto the king, and accused them, saying, that there was a certaine cursed nation spread thorow his whole kingdome, infociable, and abhorring the customes of other men, who used diuers lawes and ceremonies hatefull both for their manners and studies, to all the rest of his subiects, and all mortall men. This nation (saith hee) if thou wilt doe a gracious and acceptable fauour vnto thy people, thou shalt utterly extinguish, and leaue neither captiue nor slaue aliue amongst them. And least your maiesties tribute should bee any wayes impaired by these meanes, I promise you of mine owne reuenues fortie thousand talents of siluer; desiring rather willingly to forbeare so much money, then that your kingdome should bee vn timered of such a cursed race of men. When Aman had made this his request, the king answered, that he forgaue him the money, and that hee permitted him to deale with that nation as best him liked.
When Aman had obtained this his desire, hee presently sent an edict thorow all nations in the king's name, and to this effect. The great king Artaxerxes vnto his gouernours of a hundreth and seuen and twentie provinces, extending from India as farre as Aethiopia: Health. Having obtained the Empire ouer so many nations, and extended my dominion ouer the world, accord-ding to mine owne pleasure, without being constrained to offend any of my subiects, by vsing our power more proudly and importunately then becommeth vs, but shewing our selues fauourable and mercifull in providing for their peace, and plentiful estate, wee haue searched out the meanes thereof, to the intent that wee might perceiue the fruit. Being therefore admonished by my friend Aman (who for his wisdom and iustice is more honoured then all others by me, and for his approued fidelitie, hath the second place in authoritie next mee) that there is a certaine race of men intermeddled among you, enemies to all humanity, vsing none but their owne lawes, & such as are different from others, disobedient to their kings, and of depraued manners and customes, that neither allow our monarchie, nor further our affaires: I will and commaund, that they (being made knowne by Aman, a man whom we hold as deere as our father) bee slaine, with their wiues, and children; so as you spare none of them, attributing more vnto your owne mercie then our edict: and this commaund wee to be done the fourteenth day of the twelfth moneth of this present yere, that in one day cutting off all our enemies, hereafter it may bee lawfull for you to liue in peace and securitie. This edict being spread thorow all places of the country, and published in euerie citie; all men addressed themselves against the prefixed day, utterly to exterminate the Jewes: & no lesse diligence was there used in Susan the Metropolitane citie. Meane Mardocheus stood before the palace gate in a lamentable estate, she was sore troubled, & sent certain of her seruants vnto him to commaund him to exchange his attire, but they could not perwade him to put off his sackcloth, because the inconuenient, for which he had put it on, was not over-past. She therefore called, vnto her, her Eunuch Agathas, & sent him vnto Mardocheus, to knowe what hateful accident had befallen him, that made him put on this desolate habit; & pouer forth those lamentable reares (notwithstanding shee had instantly praied him to disrobe him of the one, and dry vp the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus tolde the Eunuch, of the edict made against the Jewes, and sent by the king vnto all his prouinces; the offer of the money that Aman likewise had rendered to the king, whereby hee had bought the vtter ruine of his nation at the kings hands.

Moreouer, hee gaue him the copy of that which had bene proclaimed in Susan, to bee deliuered vnto Ester: whom hee commaunded to beseech the king, and to esteeme it no dishonour to put on an abiect and base garment, to saue her nation, and to preserue the Jewes from that death, whereunto at that time they were exposed: for that Aman the next in honour to the king, had accused the Jewes, and incensed his maiestie against them. When Ester vnderstood this, shee sent againe vnto Mardocheus, giuing him to vnderstand that shee was not called for by the king; and that who/oeuer entred vnto him, and was not called, should die, except the king would war-rantize him by stretching out his golden scepter: for hee, vnto whome the king extended that fa-uour, although hee were not called vnto him; yet suffered hee not death, but obtained pardon.
When these things were reported by the Eunuch from Ester vnto Mardocheus, hee commaunded him to tell her, that she ought not so much to tender the particular respect of her life, as the liues of her whole nation; assuring her, that if at that present she had not care of them, their succours should wholly proceed from God by some other meanes then this: but she and her fathers house should bee destroyed by them, whom she had contemned. Vpon this reply, Ester sent the same messenger backe againe vnto Mardocheus, commaunding him to repaire vnto Susan, & to call a generall assembly of all the Jewes that remained there, willing them for three daies space to fast and abstaine from all kind of meat for her sake, and that both her selfe and her seruantes would doe the like, promising them that at that time she would present her selfe to the king, notwithstanding his contrary edict; and that if she must needs die, she would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, caused the people to fast, & to pray vnto God for her: he likewise himselfe besought him that it might please him at that present to haue compassion their desolate and distressed nation; as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as hee had pardoned them at such time as they had offended: so now also at this present he would deliuer them from that perdition which was denounced against them. For that they were not in daunger to die infamously for any offence of their owne, but because he onely had incensed Aman vnto displeasure, in that hee would not adore him, or performe that honor vnto him, which is onely due to God: for which cause in despite hee had imagined this thing against them, who would not transgresse the diuine ordinances. The people likewise prayed to the like effect, beseeching God that he would haue care of their preseruation, & warrantize the Israelites in what place soeuer they were, from the misery at hand, which was before their eyes, & already expected by them. Ester also besought God (according to her countrey manner) casting her selfe prostrate on the earth, clothed in sackcloth, and abstaining for three daies space from meat and drinke, and what thing soeuer else was delectable, beseeching God to haue compassion vpon her, that when shee presented her self before the king she might haue words fit to perwade and mollifie him, and grace and beaurie farre more amiable then euer shee had, to the ende that by these two meanes shee might be the better enabled to appeale the king, if so be he were displeased against her; and to succour her brethren agitated and tossed in extreame daunger, where-through the king might enforce his hatred against the enemies of the Jewes, and take compassion of their imminent daunger, which without his preuention would surely fall vpon them. After she had in this sort for three daies space both fasted & prayed, shee cast off her mourning attire, and changed her habite, attiring her self like a maide, call Queene, having two of her seruants on whom she leaned, and the third that followed her carried vp with the tops of her fingers her traine, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came she vnto the king, having her cheeks stained with crimson blushey, making shew of maiestie mixed with beautie, and was altogether strange to him. But when she beheld the king sitting aloft in his throne, glorious in his garments distinguished with gold, and adorned with pearle, and rich stones, a certain (as sodainly fell vpon her) by chance he had cast a frowning and yrefull look on her, whereupon being presently astonished, her members failed her, her colour faded, and she fel betwixt her handmaids armes in a swoone. Hereon, the king (by the wil of God, as I verily esteeme) changed his affection; and (suspecting least feare should cause his wife to fall into some grie-uous accident) hee sodainly leapt from his throne, and embracing her with both his armes, he raised her vp, and kissed her, and spake comfortable words vnto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to suspect any sinister misfortune, for that she came wito him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was onely made for his subiects: for which cause hee willed her (who was equall in gouernment with him) to feare nothing: whereupon he tooke his scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queenes necke: (according to the law) enforcing himselfe to deliuer her from all feares, by which means the recovered her vigour and courage, and spake after this manner.

O king, (said shee) I cannot easily expresse vnto you the inconuenience that is sodainly fallen vpon me: For as soone as I beheld the great, faire, and redoubted maiestie of your person, my spirits forsooke mee, and my heart failed me. Now whilst shee spake these wordes with paine and tearlesnesse, the king was touched with compassion: so as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (said hee) if thou demaundest the halfe of my kingdome I will grant it thee. But Esther onely requested this at his hands, that onely hee and his intire friend Aman would vouchsafe to grace her with their presence at her banquet: which the king readily granted her. Now when they were come vnto the banquet, and in the midst of their cups, the king commanded Esther to aske what shee would, and hee would grant it her, assuring her that hee would refuse her in nothing; yea, although she demanded the halfe of his kingdome. But shee deferred to discouer her suit vntill the next day, requiring him once more to repaye with Aman vnto her banquet. When the king had promised to requite her, Aman departed; with great ioy, for that hee alone had the credit to banquet with the king and Esther, and no other had cuer obtained the like honour amongst any kings of that dominion. But in his returne, perceiuing Mardocheus in the court, hee was fore moued, because that (notwithstanding he had lookt vpon him) hee had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home vnto his house, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour (not onely the king but the queene also) had done him; and how he onely with the king had supped that day with the Queene; and was invited the next day also to banquet with the king and her: notwithstanding he told them that he was discontented, because he saw Mardocheus the Jew in the court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he should cause a gallows to be raised of fittie cubits high, and that the next day he should demand licence of the king, that Mardocheus might be hanged on that lib-bet. Aman praying his wifes counsell, commanded his seruants to prepare the timber, and erect the gallows in his court; to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at Amans curled hope, and knowing certainly what should happen, took pleasure to see it prepared. For the very same night hee deprived the king of sleepe, who verie loth to spend the time idely whilst he was awake, but to imploy it in something that was profitable for his kingdome, hee commaunded his secretarie to bring him the Chronicles of the kings his predecessors, and of those things that were done by himselfe, and to read the same. When as therefore they were brought and read, hee found that a certaine man whose name was there set down, had receiued a great possession for reward in reacknowledgmet of his vertue. He read likewise of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelitie; and consequently of others; till at last he came to the place where the Eunuches Bagothes and Theodestes were noted downe, for a secret conspiracie against the person of the king; and how it was discovered by Mardocheus.
Now when the secretarie (having onely recited this accident) turned ouer to an other historie, the king staid him, and asked him if he found therein written, that he had giuen any recompence to Mardocheus. He answered, that he found nothing set down. Whereupon the king commaunded him to giue ouer, and inquired of those to whom that office appertained, what houre of the night it was; and knowing that the morning was already discovered, hee commanded that some one should certifie him, which of his familiars attended before the palace. At this time it chan-

Acced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither sooner then hee was accustomed; with an intent to beseech the king, that it might be lawfull for him to put Mardocheus to death.
Now when the officers had brought the king tidings that Aman was before the palace; they were commanded presently to call him in. As soone as hee came into the kings presence, he said vnto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithee giue mee thy counsaile, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatnesse, whome I doe most affectionately loue? Aman thinking the aduice he should giue, should bee giuen for himselfe (because he supposed that he only was beloued by the king more then al others) counsailed him that which in his opinion was the best, in this manner. For (sayd hee) if you intend to inuest the man with glorie, who (as you say) is beloued by you, cause him to be mounted vpon a braue horse, and let him be apparelled in a royall habit, and put a chaine of gold about his necke, and let some one of thy chiefest friends march before him, and proclaime thotow out the Citie, that thus is the man honoured whome the king loveth. Aman gaue this counsaile, in that hee hoped that it should be his owne fortune. But the king (highly contented with this his aduise) turning towards him, spake thus vnto him: Thou hast a horse, a garment, and a chaine, seeke out therefore the Iewe Mardocheus, and giue them him, and march thou before him, making this publike criall: or (said hee) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing bee committed to thy trust, which thou hast so faithfully counsailed. And this commaund I to bee done, in this sort; because Mardocheus hath bene the preseruer of my life. Aman hearing these words, beyond al expectation, was confused in his spirit, & being wholly discomforted, knew not which way to turne him, hee therefore issued out, hauing with him the horse, the purple habite, and the chaine of gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was clothed in sackcloth, hee enioyned him to lay his mourning habite aside, and to cloath himself in purple.
But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had hapned, and supposing that he mocked him) said: O thou wickedst man amongst men, dost thou thus mocke at our afflictions? Nor withstanding, being afterwards informed that the king had bestowed this honour on him for sauing his life, and discouering the trecherie of those Eunuches that would haue slaine him, hee put vpon him the scarlet habite that the king wore ordinarily, and put the chaine about his necke, and afterwards mounting his horse, he went round about the Citie, Aman also walking before him, and saying, that thus should bee dealt and done with him whom the king honoured, loued, and thought worthy of estimation. Now after they had circuite the whole Citie, Mardocheus gaue his attendance on the king, but Aman came not in presence; so much was hee ashamed at that which had hapned, for which cause he repaired home, and told his wife and friends, with teares, of all that which had hapned; who told him, that it was no waies possible for him to reuenge himselfe as yet on Mardocheus, because God was with him.
Now whilst they were discoursing, and debating this matter together, Esthers Eunuches came to, to haften Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadas one of the Eunuches (seeing the libbet erected in Amans lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the seruants, wherefore it was raised vp; and vnderstanding that it was for the queens vicle, whom Aman would require at the kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time he held his peace. But when the king being seated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queene to discouer what she would require that he might grant her, she began to lament the danger of her people, saying, that she with her whole nation were made a prey to the sword; and that for that cause she brake out into that discourse: For (said shee) I had not troubled your maiestie, neither had I becom agrieved, if you had commaunded that all the Iewes should bee sold, and led away captives into some miserie; for that affliction might haue bene borne: she therefore prayed him to releasethem from these miseries. When as therefore the king demanded who it was, that persecuted them thus; she began publicly to accuse Aman, saying that he alone was that wretched persecutor; and who had completed their tragedie: whereupon the king was verie fore-wounded, and desired that the banquet to depart into his garden: then began Aman to pray and beseech the king to forgive him his offence, for that at that present hee was in a dangerous estate. Now whilst these words were spoken, hee desired her favour, the king entered, and grew the more displeased that hee had said so. O then durst amongst men, dare thou attempt to enforce my will? Aman was wofully confounded with this question; so as hee had not a word to answer: himselfe upon the banquet. His Eunuches stepping forth, accused him for that hee had found him in his lodging, and being a libbet for Mardocheus, and putting the king that one of his household ser-uants (said hee) in this manner: as hee was sent to call him to the banquet, and leading more uer that the libbet was fittie cubits hie. Which when the king vnderstood, hee adiudged Aman to no other death, but that which hee intended against Mardocheus; & thereupon presently commanded that he should be hanged vpon the same libbet, vntill hee were dead. And in this place is behooueth me to admire the maiestie of God, in considering what his wisdom and iustice is, in that he not onely punished the wickednesse of Aman (as he had deserved) but also caused him to fall into the same snare which he had prepared for an other man. Thus died Aman, who had vnjustly abused the kings friendship: as for his goods they were given vnto the Queene.

After this, the king called for Mardocheus vnto him (for already he had notice that he was his wiues vncl) and gaue him the ring which he had given vnto Aman: the Queene likewise gaue him his goods, and required the King to deliuer the nation of the Iewes from that difmay whereinto they were fallen, thorow the perill of their liues: letting him to see those letters which were sent by Aman the Amadathite thorow all his countries, assuring him that shee could not lye to behold the death of her brethren, and the totall ruine of her country. The king assured her, that hee had vnderaken nothing that might discomfort her: auowing to her, that hee would not contradict her will, wishing her to write her self in the kings name all that, which she would haue done in the behalfe of the Iewes: promising that when shee had done the same, he would seale it with his owne seale, giuing her authority to send the same thorow all his realms: to the ende that they that read those letters, confirmed by the kings seale, should not any waies contradict the execution of the same. Whereupon he sent for his secretaries of estate, commanding them to write vnto the magistrats of all the nations as touching the Iewes, and to the princes and gouernors of one hundred, twentie and seven provinces, from India as farre as Ethiopia. The contents of which letters were these: Artaxerxes the great King to the gouernours and those that faithfully rule vnder vs; Health. Many men being puffed vp with pride, by reason of the many and mighty benefites and honours, which they receiue thorow the too lauish liberalitie of their benefactors, do not onely exercise their pride towards their inferiours, but also are not afraid to wax insolent against them, who are the authors of their benefites, extinguishing as much as in them lieth, all gratuitie that hath euer bene amongst men, and being corrupted with vnexpected felicitie abuse those graces against them, by whom they haue gotten the same, in effect no waies fearing God, whose power they suppose they can deceiue. On the other side, other some enhanced to the administration of the common weale, and giuing place to the hatred they haue conceived against some particular men, deceiue their princes, and by false accusations and detractions prouoke K and kindle their wrath against those, who haue not done amisse: whence it commeth to passe, that they are sometimes in extreame danger to lose their life. The prooue whereof appeareth not onely in ancient histories (the knowledge whereof we haue onely obtained by heare say) but by that likewise which hath bene audaciously attempted before our eyes; so that hereafter we ought not to giue credit to detractions and accusations, nor to such things as men intorce themselves to perswade: but it behooueth euery man to iudge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to punish that which is faulty, and to pardon that which requireth pardon, in considering the actes, and not the words that are spoken. For it is most notorious vnto all men, that Aman the Amadathite (an Amalechite by nation, and by that means a stranger, and not of the Persian blood, but entertained by vs) hath in all things enioyed the fruit of our bountie hitherto; so that he hath bene called our father, honoured by all men, and obtained amongst all men, and in all things, the second place of honor after vs: yet could he not equally make vse of his good hap, neither with prudent aduice entertaine the greatnesse of his felicitie, but hath sought the means to depriue Mardocheus of his life, who preserved mine; seeking by his fraud & malice to practise the ruine of Ester the companion of our life and kingdom; and by this means struing to dispossesse me of my most faithfull friends, hee determined to transferre the kingdom vnto others. Touching my selfe, in that I know that that the Iewes, who are by this wretch delatined to die, are no wicked men, but such as liue vnder a well policied government, praying God continually that it would please him to continue the kingdom in vs, and our successours: I absolve them not onely of that penaltie, contained in my former letters sent by Aman (which by these presents I utterly disannull) but my pleasure likewise is, that they be had in all honour. As for him that prouoked these things against them, I haue caused him and all his race to be hanged before the gates of Susa, according to the iust iudgement of God inflicted on them for their offences. My will and pleasure therefore is, that the copy of this letter be sent thorow all the countries of our obedi- fance, to the intent that the Iewes be suffered to liue, according to their owne lawes, in peace; and that assistance may bee given them, to the end they may reuenge themselves of those, who have offered them outrage in their aduersitie. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their prefermat- ion (when as they were appointed to be slain) which day I desire to fall out fortunate to those that loue vs, and a monument of reuenge on those that pretended our ruine. My pleasure likewise is, that all men, cities and nations should know, that who soeuer shall neglect, thorow obstinacie, to fulfill the tenor of this my mandate, he shall be pursued with fire and sword: and let these copies be set vp thorowout all our dominions, and let each man of the Iewes vpon the prefixed day, prepare him selfe to be reuenged on his enemies.

As soone as the Poasts had receiued these letters, they presently mounted on horsebacke, and road each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being clothed in a royall habite, & adorned with a crowne of gold on his head, and a chaine of gold about his necke, issued forth: and the Iewes of Susa, seeing him thus honoured by the king, supposed that his good hap was an assurance of their own: and when the kings letters were published, a ioy as it were a bright beam of consolation enuironed the Hebrew nation, as well those that were in the cite of Susa, as they that were amid the country; so that diuers men of other nations circumscribed themselves, for feare they had of the Iewes, supposing that in so doing they should be in securitie. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth (by the Hebrewes called Adar, & by the Macedonians Distre) the Poasts that carried the kings letters certified them, that they should exterminate their enemies on that very day, whereon they themselves were in daunger to bee exterminated. The gouernours likewise of the prouinces, the lords, kings, and secretaries, did honour to the Iewes: for the feare they had of Mardocheus constrained them to moderate themselves; and after the kings letters were published thorow all the country, it came to passe that the Iewes slew about fise hundred of their enemies. But after the king had declared vnto Ester, the number of the dead that perished in the Cite, suspecting with himselfe what might happen thorow the whole country, and had likewise questioned with her if she requested any further matter, promising her that he would see it executed: she besought him that it might bee lawfull for the Iewes to reuenge them yet once more the next day vpon their enemies, and to hang Aman ten fennes vpon the libbet: which the king (being loath to contradict Ester) permitted the Iewes to doe: they therefore returning the fourteenth day of the moneth Distre, slew about three hundred more of their enemies; yet aliened they not in any sort the smallest portion of their goods. Furthermore, the

Iewes slew in the champain country, and in the Cities, about seuentie fise thousand of their enemies, whom they dispatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, & solemnized the day following. The Iewes that were at Susa, assembled themselves likewise on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banquetted the whole day. Whence it commeth to passe, that all the Iewes which are thorowout the world, keepe and solemnize this day for a festiuall, and send presents the one vnto the other. Mardocheus also wrote vnto the Iewes, who liued vnder the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to obserue those daies, and to solemnize them; willing them to charge their successours to do the like, to the ende that this feast might continue for euer, and out- liue all obliuion. For since on that day they should haue been made away by Aman, they should doe well if after they had escaped that danger, and taken reuenge on their enemies, the very same day they should obserue the same to giue thanks vnto God: For this cause the Iewes keepe a so- lemne feast on these daies and call it Purim, as who should say, Lottes. But Mardocheus was great and mightie with the king, administering the kingdom with him; he had also a part of the great- nesse of the Queene: and for this cause the affaires of the Iewes had better success, then was hoped for. After the death of Elisiah the high Priest, Judas his sonne succeeded in the office. And after his death Iohn his sonne obtained the place; in whose time Bagoses generall of Artaxerxes army polluted the temple, & made the Iewes tributaries; so that before they could offer their ordinarie and dayly sacrifices, they were compelled to pay for euery lambe fittie drachmes, which happened vpon this occasion. Iohn had a brother called Iesus, whom Bagoses flattered, and promised to giue him the high priesthood, Iesus wonne by these perswasions, quar- relled with his brother Iohn, who was so much provoked against him, that hee slew his brother.

Iesus in his choler. It was a thing very strange, that Iohn being a priest, should commit such impiety against his brother, and yet farre more strange in that so cruell an act, and an offence so impious hath neither hapned amongst Greekes nor Barbarians: God also left it not unpunished, but for the same sinne the people were reduced vnder captiuitie, & the temple was polluted by the Persians. When Bagoes had intelligence, that Iohn (the high Priest among the Iewes) had slaine his brother Iesus in the temple, he reorted thither in all haste, and began to utter, and break forth into bitter threats against the Iewes: Haue you (said he) bene so bold as to commit murder in your temple? And when he thought to haue entred into the same, they hindred him. Whereupon he replied: Am I therefore more polluted then the body that lieth dead in the temple? And hauing spoken thus, he entred thercinto, and for the space of seauen yeares Bagoes being thus animated against the Iewes, punished them for murdering Iesus. After that Iohn was deceased, Iaddus his sonne was made high Priest; who had a brother called Manasses: Sanaballath sent by the later King Darius to gouerne Samaria (for he also was of the race of the Chuzians, from whom issued the Samaritanes) knowing that Ierusalem was a famous Citie; and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble vnto the inhabitants of Assyria, and Coelosyria; he willingly married his daughter Nicazo to this Manasses, with an intent that this marriage should be as a pledge of his good will to all the nation of the Iewes.

What benefits Alexander King of Macedon bestowed upon the Iewes.

Alexander made king after Philip his father king of Macedon.

About that time, Philip King of Macedon died in the citie of Aegæas, being traiterously slain by Pansias the sonne of Cerastes, of the race of Orestes; and his sonne Alexander succeeded him in the kingdome: who passing ouer Hellepont, gaue battell vnto the huge army of Darius neere the riuer Granic, and there obtained a famous victory. And heereupon he also inuading the countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Ionia, and ouerrunne Caria) finally set vpon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in another place. But the Elders of Ierusalem were sore displeased, for that Iaddus brother, who was at that time high Priest, and had married a forraine wowan, should bee companion and associate with him in the priesthood; so as they mutined against him. For they supposed that that marriage would be but a meanes to animate those, who had a mind to prophane marriages, and proue an inducement to others to communicate in marriage with strangers: remembering them that the cause of their euils, and first captiuitie was, because some of them had fallen, and offended by coupling themselves with women of forraine nations.

The high Priest likewise being incensed against his brother, as well as the people, draue him in like manner from the sacrifice. For which cause Manasses (addressing himselfe to his father in law Sanaballath) told him that although hee loued his daughter Nicazo very intirely; yet wold he not notwithstanding condescend for his sake to be deprived of the priesthood (which was the greatest dignity that could be among their nation, and which had neuer continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath answered and promised him, that he would not onely continue him in the priesthood, but also would giue him the power and dignity of the high priesthood, and make him gouernour of all places where hee commanded, prouided the marriage solemnized betwixt his daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore assured him that he would build a temple (resembling that in Ierusalem) vpon the mountaine of Garizim which was the highest among the rest, permitting him to do the same with Darius consent. Manasses puffed vp by these promises, remained with Sanaballath, and grew in hope that he should obtain the priesthood by Darius means: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore diuers other, both Priests and common people, among the Israelites, were mingled in such like marriages, there arose no small commotion in Ierusalem. For all they of this condition retired themselves to Manasses, whom Sanaballath furnished with money, and lands full, and houles to inhabit in, to fauour the intent of his sonne in law.

At the same time Darius vnderstanding that Alexander, having passed the Hellepont, had overcome those gouernours, whom he had established neere vnto the floud Granicus, and that he passed further, spoiling of his country; hee gathered together both his horsemen and footmen, resolving to make head against the Macedonians, before they should gain in Asia. He therefore passed Euphrates, & mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter & fight with his enemies in the country.

Sanaballath

A Sanaballath ioyful of Darius descent, incontinently told Manasses that he would fulfill his promises, as soone as Darius should return from the conquest of his enemies. For not onely he, but also all the Asians perswaded themselves most assuredly that the Macedonians would not abide the battell against the Persians, by reason of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrarie to their expectation. For the Persian encountering with the Macedonian was ouercome, and after he had lost the greater part of his armie, and left his mother, wife and children prisoners, he himselfe fled into Persia. Alexander arriving in Syria, seized Damasco, tooke Sidon, and besieged Tyre: and by his letters sent vnto the high priest of the Iewes, he required him to send him some supplies in his warre, and to sell his armie victuals for their money; assuring him that if hee desired the friendship of the Macedonians, hee would giue him that tribute which he paid to Darius, besides other good turnes. The high priest answered Alexanders messenger, that hee had sworn vnto Darius neuer to beare armes against him, during his life time; against which oth of his, he would neuer worke any indignitie. Which when Alexander heard, he was sore displeased, & resolved notwithstanding to continue the siege at Tyre, vntil such time as it was taken; yet threatened he that as soon as he had taken the same, he would lead forth his army against the high priest, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keepe their faith. For which cause sparing no labour, hee ouercame Tyre, and after he had giuen order to the estate therof, he came vnto Gaza, and tooke it with Babemes the captaine of the garrison that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunitie to make himselfe great, forooke Darius & followed Alexander, leading with him eight thousand of his subiects: and finding him vpon the beginning of the siege of Tyre, he offered to surrender him all those places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had done Darius. Alexander accepted him willingly: whereupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole estate, giuing him to vnderstand that Manasses (who was brother to Iaddus the high priest of the Iewes) was his sonne in law, who with diuers of the same nation, were desirous to build them a temple in the countries vnder his dominion, assuring the king of much profit thereby, because in so doing the force of the Iewes should bee diminished into two parts, and they might not conspire together to make any new insurrection or trouble, as in times past they had done during the gouernment of the kings of Assyria.

When Sanaballath had permission from Alexander to build this temple, with the greatest speed hee might, he finished the same, and made Manasses the high Priest thereof, supposing that it was the greatest aduantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seuen moneths after the surprisall of Tyre, and two after the taking in of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander also raised Gaza, and prepared himselfe to come sodainly vpon Ierusalem. Which when the high priest Iaddus vnderstood, he was much grieved, and sore afraid, not knowing how to grow in fauour with the Macedonians: and on the other side knowing that the king was displeased against him (because before time hee had disobeyed him:) Hee therefore commanded the people to make their prayers vnto God, and hee in his owne person offered sacrifice; requiring God that it would please him to be a shield of defence, and succour to their nation, and to deliuer them from those imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whilest hee slept, God appeared vnto him, and willed him to be of good courage, and commanding him that as soone as hee had circuite the wals, hee should open the gates boldly, and command the rest of the people to attire themselves in white; and that accompanied with them, he should march forward in those priestly ornaments, which were ordained by the lawe, to the ende that in this equipage they might goe and meet with Alexander, without apprehension of any future euill, because that God had preuented the same. As soone as hee awaked from his sleep, he was very ioyfull, and certified the rest of this prediction of God; and performing that which had bene commanded him, hee expected in this manner the approche of the king; and when he knew that he was not farre off from the Citie, hee marched forth to meete him, accompanied with the Priests, and a multitude of other people, presenting a most toyll manner of entertaine, and farre different from that of other nations, neere vnto a place called Sapha; which worde signifieth a watch (by reason that from that place a man may discover the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem.) The Phoenicians and Chaldeans that were of Alexanders train, grounding their hopes vpon his displeasure, made their attempt to sacke the Citie, and to hewe the high Priest in pieces; but it fell out quite contrarie. For Alexander espying the people from afarre in white rayments, and the Priests going before them in their fine tochers, and the high Priest attired in a robe of purple, bordered with gold, hauing his miter on his head, and his plate of gold, wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himselfe marched forward before the rest of his companie, and fell fell prostrate on his face before that Name, saluting first of all the hie Priest; and at the same instant all the Iewes together saluted the king with one voice, and circled him in round about. The kings of Syria & the rest that saw that which hapned, were wonderfully astonished, and thought that the king was out of his wits: Parmenio onely drew neere vnto him, and asked him what he meant to adore the Priest of the Iewes, whereas all other men adored him: To whom he answered; I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Priest worshippeth: for in my sleepe I sawe him in such a habite, as I see him in at this present, at such time as I was in Dio a Citie of Macedonia: and whilest I consulted with my selfe by what means I might attaine to the conquest of Asia, he counselled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, assuring mee that it would be he that would guide both me and mine armie, and would deliuer the Empire of the Persians into my hands. Since that time I haue not seene any one attired after the same manner: and at this present beholding this man, and remembreing mee of the vision, and exhortation that hee gaue me in my sleepe, I hope that mine armie being conducted by diuine providence, I shall overcome Darius, and discomfit the Persians; and that my purpose shall haue a happy issue.

Alexanders sacrifice in the

by D. niels prophecy, his bounty to the Iewes.

When he had answered Parmenio in this sort, he gaue the high Priest his hand, and went with him into the Citie, being conducted by the Priests: after this, when he came vnto the temple, hee offered sacrifice, according to the hie priests direction, whom he honored likewise with very great reuerence. And when as likewise Iaddus shewed him the prophetic of Daniel, wherein hee declared that a certaine man of the nation of the Greekes, should destroy the estate of the Persians, and that in his opinion it should be hee: thereof Alexander was very ioyfull, and dismissed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day assembling the Iewes, he commanded them to demand certaine fauours at his hands: whereupon the high priest answered, that hee required the exercises of the ordinances of their forefathers, and that euerie seuenth yeere they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They besought him likewise that by his permission the Iewes that were in the countries of Babylon and Media, might liue according to their lawes: And he promised them willingly to doe all that which they desired. He made proclamation also among the people, that if any one of them would beare armes with him (in liuing according to the custome of their nation) he was ready to receiue them with him: and diuers tooke pleasure to serue vnder him in the warres.

After that Alexander had in this sort demeaned himselfe in Ierusalem, hee marched with his armie against the neighbouring Citie: and wherefoeuer he went, he was receiued with great affection. But the Samaritanes, whose Metropolitane Citie at that time was Sichem (situate neere vnto the mountaine of Garizim, in which their dwelt diuers Iewes also, that were revolted from their nation) seeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Iewes, they resolved to demean themselves like Iewes. For such is the nature of Samaritanes (as we haue declared heretofore) that when the Iewes are in affliction, they denie all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confesse the truth:) but when they perceiue any beam of good aduerture shining vpon them, sodainly they vaunt of their alliance, laying, they are neere akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manasses the sonnes of Ioseph. They came therefore to the kings presence, and met him neere vnto Ierusalem, with great magnificence, and demonstration of singular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approached neere vnto him (being accompanied with those men of war that Sanaballath had sent vnto the king) beseeching him that he would visit their Citie and honor their temple with his presence: whereupon he promised that at his returne hee would visit them. They required him also, that hee would acquite them of the tribute of the seuenth yeere, because they did not sowe in the same. Hee asked them who they were that made that request? They answered him, that they were Hebrewes: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sidonians. Hee asked them againe, if they were Iewes? and they said, they were not. Well (said he) I haue made this grant vnto the Iewes: when as therefore I shall returne, if I be more particularly informed, I shall doe that which shall be held requisite. Thus dismissed he the Sichemites, but hee commanded Sanaballaths men of war to follow him into Aegypt: promising in that place to impart possessions vnto them by lots, which afterwards he did enioyning them to liue in garrison in the Citie of Thebais, to make good that country. After Alexanders death, his Empire was diuided amongst his successors, & the temple builded neere vnto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accused in Ierusalem for eating vnawful meats, or for transgressing the Sabbath, or for any such like fault, hee fled vnto the Sichemites, laying, that he was accused vniustly. In that time deceased the hie priest Iaddus: and Onias, his sonne succeeded him. This was the estate of them of Ierusalem at that time.

CHAP. I.

Ptolomey the sonne of Lagus overcommeth and surpriseth both Ierusalem and Iudaea by a stratageme, and leadeth away diuers of the Iewes prisoners into Aegypt.

Alexander King of Macedon hauing overcome the Persians, and established the estate of the Iewes (according as it hath beene spoken) hee departed this life. Whereupon his dominions and kingdomes fell into diuers mens hands; Antigonus was Lord of Asia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering nations: Lyfismachus had Hellefpont: Cassander Macedon: and Ptolomey the sonne of Lagus held Aegypt. Now when as these men were at discord amongst themselves (whilest each of them affected the soueraintie, & fought the one with the other) diuers great and continuall warres grew to head, which afflicted manie Cities: whereby it came to passe, that many of the inhabitants thereof died in fight, and all Syria likewise vnder Ptolomey the sonne of Lagus (who beyond his merit was called Soter, that is as much to say, as a Sauour) liued in little safetie. Hee it was that seized Ierusalem by a stratageme, and

and policie: for hee entred the Citie vpon a Sabbath day, vnder pretext to offer sacrifices; and whilest the Iewes suspected nothing, but spent the day in idlenesse and quiet, hee surprised the Citie without resist, and ouerpressed the Citizens with hatefull captiuitie. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the actes of Alexanders successors) witnesseth no lesse, reproching vs of superstition; as if intending thereby, that by that meanes we lost our Citie. Hee writeth to this effect. There is a certaine nation, which are called Iewes, who inhabit a Citie which is called Ierusalem, both strong and mightie. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomeis hands, because they would not stand vpon their guard, and thorow their importunate superstition, they permitted themselues to be subdued by a tyrant conqueror. See here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation. But Ptolomey leading away with him diuers prisoners of the better quarters of Iudæa, and the places neer vnto Ierusalem, of Samaria and mount Garizim, sent them into Aegypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Ierusalem were most firme in maintaining their oaths and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, he sent Embassadors vnto them: hee put diuers of them into his garrisons, giuing them the same priuiledges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After hee had receiued their oath, that they should be faithfull vnto his successors, in memorie of the great trust and fauours hee had bestowed on them, many of the other Iewes likewise of their owne accord went into Aegypt, partly allured thereunto by the plentie of the country, partly by the liberalitie of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continuall seditions betwixt their posteritie and the Samaritanes: for that they would keepe and maintaine the customes and ordinances of their forefathers; whereupon diuers wars arose amongst them. For they of Ierusalem said, that their temple was the true sanctuarie of God, and would that the offerings and sacrifices should be sent thither: the Samaritanes contrariwise commaunded them to be brought to the mount Garizim.

After him Philadelphus succeeded in the kingdom of Aegypt, and held it for nine & thirtie years space. He it was that translated the law into the Greeke tongue, and deliuered the Iewes from that seruitude, wherein they were enthralled in Aegypt, to the number of sixscore thousand, vpon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalereus maister of the kings library, endeouored to his vttermost to gather vp all sorts of bookes that were in the world, & bought all that which was agreeable to the kings intent, who about all things was curious to assemble diuersitie of bookes. Hee being one day demanded by the king, how many thousands of volumes hee had already gathered: he answered him, that he had already assembled about some two hundred thousand volumes: but that shortly hee would gather to the number of five hundred thousand. Besides, hee certified him, that he had bene lately aduertised that there were diuers volumes among the Iewes, wherein many things as touching their lawes and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and delerued to be put in so memorable and famous a library as his was: which being written and set downe in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greeke tongue. For their characters seeme to haue some reference to the Syriacke, and their pronounciation likewise not much different from the same: and notwithstanding they haue their phrased proper and peculiar vnto themselves. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated: for the king defraying the charge, might easily cause it to be done, to the end that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his librarie. Heereupon the king praying Demetrius care in collecting and gathering bookes, wrote vnto the high Priest of the Iewes, commanding that this translation might be finished. In the meane time a certaine man called Aristaus, who was intirely beloued and befriended by the king, by reason of his modestie, and had diuers times before that present resolued with himselfe to sollicite the King, to dismiss all the Iewes that were in his kingdom, supposing that at that instant hee had fit opportunitie offered him to make his request, he spake vnto Sosibius the Tarentine, and Andrew the chiefe captaine of the kings guard, beseeching them to fauour him in that which he intended to moue the king in. Hauing therefore lounded the affections of these noble men, hee addressed himselfe

A himselfe vnto the king, and spake vnto him after this maner: Since my soueraigne, it behooueth vs not to deceiue our selues by dissimulation, but it necessarily importeth vs to discouer the truth: whereas we haue concluded with our selues, not onely to transcribe, but also to translate the lawes of the Iewes, the rather to performe some acceptable seruice to your grace; what honest pretext is therelost for vs to attaine thereunto, as long as there are so great a number of Iewes kept in thraldome in thy kingdome? You shall therefore doe a worke answerable to the greatnes of your courage and benignitie, if you deliuer them from their miserie, considering that hee who gaue them their lawes is God, who gouerneth your kingdome (as by diligent inquisition I haue certaintly apprehended) for both they and wee adore one God creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Iupiter, for as much as he maintaineth our life & the liues of all men. For that honour therefore which you owe vnto God, send backe these people into their country, and permit them to inhabit the same, who amongst all men are most singularly affected to their religion. Neither hath your Grace occasion to suspect, that I offer these supplications and prayers vnto you in their fauour, and for their profit, because I am either allied or defended of any of their tribes: But whereas there is but one God, who is the maker of all men, and I myselfe am assured, that he taketh pleasure in those men that addict themselves to beneficence, this is the onely cause that induceth me to make this request vnto you. When Aristaus had ended this discourse of his, the king beholding him with a cheerefull and pleasant countenance, asked him how many thousands he thought they were, whose libertie he required? Andrew (being hard at hand) answered, that there were more then one hundred and twentie thousand. Whereupon the king replied, Is this demaund Aristaus a matter of small consequence, which thou requirest? Sosibius and the other assistants answered, that his reacknowledgement which hee made vnto God, who had giuen him the kingdome, was worthy the greatnes of his courage; so that reioycing at this their content, he charged him at such time as they deliuered the men of warre their pay, they should ouer & above the same, pay euery one of them that had prisoners with them, sixscore drachmes: and as touching the request made by them, he promised them to dispatch his letters patents, in most ample manner, to bring a happy issue to Aristaus suite; or rather to satisfie the will of God, which was especially to be respected. Whereunto conforming himselfe, hee sent out his proclamation; certifying thereby that hee not onely let them at libertie, who had bene brought thither by his father, or those of his army who attended him; but them also who before time had bene in his kingdome; or that sithence likewise had bene brought thither: and notwithstanding it was told him that the money that would bee required for their rancome would amount to more then foure hundred talents; yet ceased hee not to confirme that which he had promised. But that it may more plainly appeare how great his royal magnificence was, I haue thought good to insert in this place the copie of his edict, which hee sent abroad to this effect. Vhofoeuer of you that in my fathers seruice (by bearing armes vnder him) haue made any roades into Syria and Phoenicia, and after the conquest of Iudæa haue taken any prisoners, and brought them to our Cities and countries, with an intent to sell them: all they also, who haue heretofore detained any, or at this present haue any such captiues in their possession, they are to let them at libertie that liue vnder their thraldome, receiuing for the rancome of euery person sixscore drachmes: namely the men of warre, at such time as their wages shall bee paid them: as for the rest, they shall receiue their money out of the kings treasure. For I am of that opinion, that contrarie to my fathers mind, & against all right, they haue bene taken prisoners, and that their country hath bin in this sort euilly intreated, by the insolencie of the soldiers, who haue thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, in transferring them into Egypt. Hauing therefore an especiall respect of iustice, and intending to shew mercy to those who are wrongfully oppressed, I commaund that all those Iewes, who are detained in seruitude be discharged, and that they who held them captiue receiue the rancome published by vs; so as no deceit or fraud be used therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled, our will is; that this edict of ours be publicly proclaimed three daies after it shall come vnto your hands; and that those, who hold such prisoners in their possession, declare how many prisoners they hold. For we suppose, that in so doing it shall redound to our profit. Moreover, it shall bee full for any man that will, to accuse the contemners of this decree, and our pleasure is that such as be convicted the same, shall haue their goods confiscated to the Kings vses. When this edict of the Kings published to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that onely point was omitted, that concerned those that before time had been, & afterward the second time were led away prisoners, in whose behalfe hee had giuen no direction; he shewed himselfe most bountifull in like manner toward these:

these: And gaue order that the number and rallie should be speedily gathered, and the money ditributed to the committes, & treasurers appertaining to him. Which being speedily performed in the space of seven daies, all the kings ordinance was accomplished, and there was laid out for the ransomes of them all to the summe of more then foure hundredth and sixtie talents: For the masters exacted sixscore drachmes for the children also, grounding themselves vpon the kings edict, by which it was ordained that for euerie person they should haue that summe, extending the same euen vnto the children.

These things being thus magnificently employred, according to the kings command, hee gaue Demetrius in charge to make a decree, as touching the translation of the bookes of the Iewes. For the kings did nothing rashly, but administred all things with great wisdom, and circumspection; and for that cause the copie of Demetrius suggestion, and the letters sent to this effect, are orderly registred, and recorded in writing: the number likewise of the presents that were sent, and by whom they were offered. So that whosoever shall behold the same, hee shall incontinently iudge by the curious workmanship the high perfection of the workman, and by the excellencies of the pieces he shall incontinently know by whom each of them was fa-great king: Health. Most mighty Prince, since you haue committed the trust vnto me to find out those bookes that are deficient in your librarie, and to search for such volumes as hitherto haue beene hid from my sight, to the end that I might gather them and perfect them, and that those which are lost, might be restored with all the diligence that thereunto belongeth, after that I had want the books of the lawes of the Iewes. For in that they are written in Characters & Hebrew words, we haue had no notice thereof; where-through they haue been more negligently handled then was behouefull: for that vntill this day it hath neuer hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended so farre. It therefore behoueth thee to haue them exactly interpreted: for since that those lawes proceeded from God himselfe, it is most certaine that of all other lawes in the world they are the wisest and incorruptest. For which cause, Hecataeus the Abderite saith, that neither Poets nor Historians haue made any mention of them; neither of those, who haue beene policed and gouerned vnder the same: because in themselves they are pure, and are not to be declared by impurities. May it therefore please your Maiestie to write vnto the high Priest of the Iewes, commanding him to send you sixe Auncients of euerie tribe, such as hee shall know to be most expert in their law, by whom wee may cleerly apprehend the sense contained in those bookes, to the end that hauing the faithfull interpretation of those things that are contained therin, we may collect and gather them together, to the full satisfaction of your Maiesties desire.

The kings liberality towards the Iewes.

When the king had in this sort beene both aduised & suggested, he wrote vnto Eleazar the high Priest of the Iewes, as touching this matter: giuing him likewise to vnderstand of that libertie by him granted vnto the Iewes that were in his kingdome: He sent him also fiftie talents of gold, to make cups, ewers, and vessels, with an infinite number of precious stones, commanding his cofers, who had the charge of his Iewels, to suffer the workmen to choose what stones they best liked. Furthermore, he willed that a hundredth talents should bee giuen for the sacrifices and oblations, and other uses of the temple. But after that I haue declared what was the copie of the letter sent vnto Eleazar the high Priest, and the manner how hee obtained that sacerdotal dignitie: I will set downe both the rich presents, and their curious workmanship.

After the death of Onias the high Priest, his sonne Simon surnamed the Iust, succeeded him in his place, who for that cause was so called, by reason of the piety which he shewed toward God, & the good affection which he bare vnto his countrymen. This Simon dying & leauing behind him one onely son, of yong & tender yeeres who was called Onias: his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we speake at this present) rooke vpon him the priesthood, and to him wrote Ptolomey in such manner as is hereafter expressed. King Ptolomey to the high priest Eleazar, Health. Where-reigns of the Persians they were drawn thither as prisoners) some of whom hee hath establishtivity, 280.

A mine owne cofers: I haue likewise inrouled some of those that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of warre: I haue receiued some into my court, whom I took to be faithfull & loyall, and in my opinion well worthy of such preferment: supposing that the most acceptable and the deereest present I might offer vp vnto God, for his prouidence extended toward me in ad-uancing me to the kingdome, was to performe the same. And being desirous not onely to gratifie them, but also al those Iewes that are in the whole world, I haue determined to cause your law to be translated; that after it hath been transcribed out of Hebrew into Greeke, I might place it in my librarie. You shall therefore doe well, if you choose me out six discreet and learned men of euerie tribe amongst you, who are already steeped in yeeres, and send them vnto me, who by reason of their age shall be well instructed in your lawes, and sufficiently enabled to expound the same.

B For in so doing, I shall accept it at your hands, as a great honour. For this cause I send vnto you Andrew the principall captaine of my guard, and Ariflaus also (whom we especially honour) to conferre with you: by whom I haue sent you one hundredth talents of siluer, as the first fruits of those gifts and sacrifices, which we intend to offer in the temple. You shall doe vs an especial fa-uour, if you signifie your mind vnto vs by your letters.

As loone as Eleazar had receiued the kings letters, he returned him an answer full of honour and affection, according to the tenour which ensueth. The high priest Eleazar to king Ptolomey: Health. If you, your Queene Arifnoe, and your children be in health, all our affaires likewise haue no lesse fortunate successe. We haue receiued your princely letters with no small ioy, & haue both read and considered vpon the contents thereof; wee haue also published them in the presence of Eleazars letters in answer to Ptolomey.

C all the people, and haue declared vnto them your pietie towards God, & haue shewed them those viols which you sent vs, twenty of gold, and thirty of siluer; with five vessels, and a table which in way of present you haue sent vnto vs. We haue likewise shewed them those hundredth talents which Andrew and Ariflaus (very vertuous and excellently learned men, and honoured by you amongst your deereest friends) haue brought vnto vs, to be employed in sacrifices and other necessities of the temple. Know therefore, that whatsoever standeth either with your content or profit, we will enforce our owne natures, to the end we may acknowledge the benefits, which you haue diuers waies bestowed vpon our nation. Wee haue therefore duly and continually offered sacrifice for you, your Queene Arifnoe, your children & friends: the people likewise haue praised that God would send you happy successe in whatsoever you desire, that your kingdome may be

D continued in peace, and that the translation of our law may be accomplished in such sort, as you desire, for your owne commoditie. To that intent wee haue chosen six Elders out of euerie tribe, whom we send vnto you, together with the originall of our law. Our request is, that according to your accustomed pietie and iustice, you returne vs both our lawes & these interpreters in safe-tie, as soone as they haue satisfied your expectation. Fare you well.

This is the answer which the high Priest sent vnto him. Yet haue I thought it to be a matter meerely vnneccessarie to set downe the names of the seuentie two Elders in particular, who were sent by Eleazar together with the lawe, notwithstanding they were set downe in the Epistle. Yet thinke I it not amisse, to recite the excellencie and fashion of those presents that were sent by the king, and offered vp vnto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous hee was towards the seruice of God. For in performance thereof, he spared no immeasurable expence, but continually assited the workemen, & examined their workmanship, to the end that nothing might be carelessly finished, or negligently performed. I will therefore set downe (as neere as in me li-eth) the excellencie of euery peece (although it may be thought that the course of historie requireth it not) but therefore will I discoure the same, because my desire is by so doing to expresse vnto the readers, how great the liberalitie and generositie of the king hath beene. And first of all I will begin to describe the table.

The king desirous to make it great in all dimensions, desired to know the greatnes of that which was at Ierusalem, to the intent that he might cause it to be far greater. And hauing certain notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, hee said that he would haue it five times greater then the other: but that hee feared, least being so great it would be vnfit to offer sacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the oblations, which he offered, should not onely serue for shew, but that they might also be somewhat proper for the vse and seruice of the temple. For this cause, concluding that the first was of sufficient and conuenient measure, hee resolved that his should not exceede the other in greatnes; but that equal-ling the same in quantitie of gold, it might exceede the other in variety and beauty of workmanship. For he was ingenious to obserue the nature of diuers things, and to inuent new and vnex-pected

pested fashion: so that by his ripe iudgement, he shewed the workemen such inuentions, as before time had not bene in vse; and commanded them to make and finish them; hauing alwaies an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to worke by. He vndertooke therefore to make the table of two cubits and a halfe in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a halfe in height, all of masiue gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large; enriched with mouing waues, on which there was a bend grauen with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being triangular, euery angle presented the same engrauiing; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no waies different figure, represented it selfe: within the inside of this border it was inchaufed with diuers goodly figures, but on the outside it was farre more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eie. For this cause the vpper part of the table appeared to bee of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we said) were apparant at such time as the table was turned, each one seeming of equall magnitude with the other. Vpon the graued bends there were precious stones inchaufed, distant by equall proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tyed by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselves to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the manner of an ouall; and there was a border of golden twigs engrauen round about the table: vnder the ouals there was a crown garnished with clusters of diuers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung downe, the spikes of corne stood vpright, and all was inclosed with pomgranats, and the precious stones were enchaufed in gold thorow the whole circuit of the table, to represent each sort of fruit in their natie colours. There was also a ranke of ouals vnder the crowne, not vnlike vnto the former, made of gold: so that on both sides, both the variety and delicacie of the worke appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the table, in which there appeared not any difference, on what soeuer side it was turned; and from the top vnto the lower foot one & the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some foure fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the table, on which the feet of the same were staied, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and claspes of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better bee scene, and that on what side soeuer it were turned, it might alwaies seeme the same. They engraued also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were diuers kindes of precious stones, shining like starres; and amongst the rest there were Rubies and emeralds of most orient brightnes, as also all other sorts of stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beauty or price. Neere vnto this labyrinth from the one end vnto the other, there went certain corded pleites in the middle like vnto a Rhombus or Loseng, vpon which there were certaine pieces of Crystall and Amber, enchaufed and placed the one by the other in equall distance, & proportion: which gaue a marueilous contentment to whomsoeuer beheld the same: The Chapters of the feet were made after the forme of a lillie; the leaues whereof bent themselves vnder the table, whereas otherwaies the stalke seemed to bee stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands breadth large, adorned with a carbuncle in euery part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feete was staied; and on euery one of them was there ingrauen by curious workmanship Iuie, and vine branches laden with clusters of grapes; so made to life, that they seemed to bee very grapes in deede. For the whole was so subtil and delicate, that when the winde blew, the workmanship waied and was carried vp on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather naturall, then counterfayted by art. The worke was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seames and ioints might not any waies bee scene. The thicknes of the table was no lesse then halfe a cubite.

See here what this present was, which through intire affection the king presented; wherein the price of the stuffe, the diuersitie and beauty of the wormanship, and the excellencie of the engrauiing was accomplished in perfection. Moreover, in this hee so farre inforced himselfe to performe so much, that if it might not surpass the other which was already in the temple, at least-wise in art, new inuention and excellencie of proiect, it might bee farre more excellent and admirable. He gaue besides this, two vessels of gold, scaled from the bottome as farre as the halfe part of the Cup; and besides that, enriched with diuers precious stones curiously and diuerlie enchaufed. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubite hie, made of all sorts of precious stones; and at the foote thereof were ingraued spires, after the manner of twigs, and fast by them a certaine sould like vnto a net made in ouall fashion, that ascended euen vnto the brims.
The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatnes of foure fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies, iuy, flowers, and vines with their clusters

A sters of grapes engrauen round about. This was the beauty & excellencie of those two cups, each of them containing twenty and foure pintes. There were also others made of silver, so transparent, as if they had been of the purest crystall, thorow which all things that were put into them, were naturally and manifestly discovered. He caused also thirty ewers to be made, in which all the gold that was not couered with precious stones, was shadowed with Iuie leaues, & vine branches most curiously engrauen: and all these things were not onely miraculously wrought by the wonderfull cunning of the workemen; but were in like sort seconded by an ambitious diligence of the king, who thinking it not enough that without parsimonie he had vnderaken the charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his more serious affaires) visit the shops, and examine the workes; and that which more and more encreased their diligence, was, for that they saw him so intent vpon B the business, which made them the more earnest vpon their worke.

And these were the presents which were sent by this king to be dedicated in the temple of Jerusalem. All which being consecrated and laid vp in the temple by the high Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and deliuered into their hands certain presents to be tendered in his behalfe vnto the king, he dismissed & sent them back again. No sooner were they arriued in Alexandria, but the king (hauing notice thereof, and how the seuentie two Elders were come with them) he sent to seek out his Embassadors Andrew & Aristaeus, who came and presented him with letters from the high Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face. And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jerusalem to expound & interpret the law, he contrary to his ordinary custome C and maner, dismissed all those that resorted thither for their particular affaires, to whom hee was accustomed to giue audience euery fift day; as it was his ordinary maner also to giue monethly satisfaction to forraigne Embassadors. Hauing therefore for that time dismissed them, hee kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent vnto him; who coming to his presence (accompanied with those presents which the high Priest had deliuered them to present vnto him, with the original wherein the lawe was written with golden letters) he asked them where their bookes were:
and they discovering and opening them, shewed them vnto him. After the king had scene them, he was very much astonished, to see the membranes & parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole forme thereof so perfectly conioyned, that it was impossible to discover the seams; and he told them that he gaue them thanks for that they were come vnto him, & more great thanks D vnto him that had sent them, and the greatest and most speciall thanks vnto God, who was the author of these lawes. Whereupon, the Elders and those that assisted them, cried out altogether, and wished that all good hap might befall the king: who, thorow the excelsiue ioy that hee con-ceiued, burst out into teares: For naturally extream ioy & most grievous sadness haue like effects.
After he had commanded that these bookes should be committed to their trust, who were deputed to that office, at length he saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behouefull for him first of all to debate with them vpon the matter, to which intent he had sent for them: and afterwards to giue them entertainment: in a word, he confessed vnto them, that their access was so gratefull vnto him, that he promised them, so long time as he liued, hee would euery yeere renew and honour the memory of the same: (and by good hap it was the very same day wherein he E ouercame Antigonus by sea.) His pleasure was also, that they should be his guests, and hee caused diuers goodly lodgings to be assigned them vnder the Castle.

Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertaine strangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily emploied in the same) to prepare for euery one of them such things, as were necessarie for their diet and entertainment. For so was it ordained by the king, that in euery Citie that had any particularity in their manner of life, there should bee a commissary appointed to prouide for forrainers that arriued in that place, to the intent they might be entreated according to their customes: intending thereby that their entertainment should be the more agreeable vnto them, and that they might be the lesse tired with forraigne nouelties. This custome of his was put in practise at this time, by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his owne person disposed all that which was necessary for that hospitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in F two seuerall parts (according as the king had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him, and the rest might be placed neere vnto his table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kind enteruiue. When they were in this sort placed, the king commanded Dorotheus to entertaine them in like manner, as he was wont to doe those, who repaired vnto his court from Iudaea. Hereupon, he dismissed the Egyptian priest, and other that were wont to make the ordinary prayers: which done, hee commanded that one of the elders called Elifens (who in like sort was a priest) to blesse the table: whereupon he standing vpright in the midst of them all, besought God to blesse both the king and his subiects with all happines. Whereupon there arose an applause and acclamation of all men, intermixed with ioyfull delight; which being ceased, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheere, with that which was set before them. When the king had held his peace so long as he thought conuenient, he began at last to play the Philosopher, asking of euery one of them certaine questions in Phisicke, praying them to decide and discusse the same: and when as each of them in order had ve-rie pertinently answered to the question that was propounded vnto them, the king tooke great pleasure therein, and for twelue daies space he continued this feast. Who so desireth to know the questions that were proposed vnto them in particular, let him read the booke which Arista-rus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was nor onely astonished at their answers, H but the Philosopher Menedemus also: who hauing affirmed that all things were administered by diuine prouidence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this discourse was, this questioning debate was finished. But the king protested in their presence, that their access had infinitely contented and instructed him, in that by their meanes he had obtained the good hap to be enformed by them how to gouerne his kingdom. Whereupon hee commanded that each of them should haue three talents giuen him, and that they might bee conuained to their lodgings. Some foure daies after, Demetrius tooke them with him, and led them ouer that trench of the sea, that containeth seuen furlongs, and that bridge which coupleth the Island with the continent, & towards the northermost end thereof, he assigned them a lodging remote from all noice, and fit for contemplation: to which place after he had brought them, he besought them, I that since they had all those things that were necessarie for the interpretation of their lawes, they would intend the same without any discontinuance of the worke, vntill they had brought it to perfection; and they for their parts employed all their labour and diligence that was in them possible, to the end the interpretation might bee exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning vntill three houres after noone: after which time they employed the rest of the day in their refections; & to that end they were furnished in all abundance with all sorts of victuals.ouer and besides, Dorotheus presented them with a part of diuers dishes, which were prepared for the King: for so had his Maiesty commanded it. Thus euery morning entred they the Kings palace, and after they had saluted him, they retired themselves to their accustomed place; and after they had washed their hands in the sea water, and were purified, they set them K downe in that maner to proceed, and prosecute their translation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the worke was fully finished in the space of seuentie and two daies: Demetrius assembled all the Iewes in that place where the law had bene translated, and caused it to be read ouer in the presence of the interpreters themselves. Which done, the assembly approoued the exposition of the interpreters; and praised Demetrius, by whose suggestions, and inuen-tion they enioyed so great a good. They requested likewise, that this exposition should be perused, and ouerread by the Nobles and Gouernours. After this, both the Priest, the Elders of the interpreters, and the magistrates of the people required, that since this translation was so happily achieved, it might remaine vnaltered; so that no iot thereof might be changed.

Which resolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered that if any man perceived any L thing in that translation, which was either exuperant or deficient, hee should consider there-vpon and giue notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing hercin very discreetly, to the end that that which had once bene adiudged good, should continue inuiolable for euer.
The King therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeouours and purpose in that behalfe so happily and profitably finished: but about all things, hee tooke pleasure in reading of the law, admiring at the deep conceit and wisdom of the law-maker; and began to question with Demetrius, by what meanes it came to passe, that neither any Poet, nor Historiographer had made mention of that law, notwithstanding that in it selfe it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gaue this answer: that no man was so hardie to touch that worke, by reason that it was diuine and euery way venerable: assuring him also, that certaine men who had attempted to set their M hands thereto, had bene punished by God: giuing him to vnderstand, how Theopompus intending to reduce certaine contents of that law into his history, had bene distraught in minde for more then thirtie daies, and that hauing some intermission of his fit, he appealed God by praier; thereby easily coniecturing what was the cause of his malady. Moreouer, he was certified by a vision that appeared vnto him in his sleepe, that this inconuenient befell him, in that he had too curiously searched into sacred and diuine matters, and had intended to communicate the same with pro-

A Phophamen: from which enterprisc sith hee had desisted, hee recovered his right wits againe.
Holikewise insinuated further, that Theodeltes the tragicke Poet, intending to make mention in some of his Poems of a certaine historie written in the sacred Scriptures, was strooken blind; & acknowledging the cause hereof to proceed from his audacious presumption, he was restored to his sight after he had appealed Gods displeasure.

When the king had considered on these words, according as Demetrius had discoursed them vnto him, hee prostrated himselfe on the earth, and commanded that the bookes should be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integritie. Furthermore, he exhorted the Translators to repaire oftentimes vnto him from Iudaea, assuring them that in so doing the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time hee thought B good to dismiss them: but when they should returne vnto him againe of their own motion, they should obtaine all that which their wisdom deserued, or his magnificence might impart vnto them. This said, he gaue them leaue to depart, after hee had giuen each of them 3 leuall sutes of apparel, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, & a certaine bed or curious seat to sit and banquet vpon. This gaue he them for themselves. But to Eleazar the hie Priest he sent by them ten couches, whose feet were of siluer, & the furniture correspondent, & a vessel of 30 talents. Tenne purple robes likewise, and a magnificent crowne, and one hundred pieces of fine linnen: and besides that, he sent in way of present vnto the temple, ewers, basons, and tivo golden vessels: beseeching Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his subiects had a wil to come vnto him, he would permit him, assuring him that he would highly esteeme the conuersation of C so learned men: & that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleasure in such affaires.
See heere how Ptolomey Philadelph esteemed and honoured the Iewes.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Asia honoured the nation of the Iewes, and gaue them libertie and freedome to dwell in those Citties that were builded by them.

D They receiued honor likewise at the hands of the kings of Asia, because they had borne armes vnder them. For Seleucus surnamed Nicanor, highly respected them, & permitted them to dwell in those cities, which hee built in Asia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewise, which was the Metropolitane and chiefe Citie. Moreouer hee ordained, that they should be held in as great estimation, as either the Macedonians or Greekes that inhabited therein: so that euen vnto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Iewes refusing to annoint themselves with forraigne oyle, doe receiue a certaine summe of money from the masters of the exercises in lieu of the oyle. Which whē the people of Antioch intended to abolish, during the present war, Mutianus at that time gouernour of Syria, opposed himselfe against them. Againe, when as Vespasian and his sonne Titus had conquered the world; although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them; that the priuiledges that the Iewes enioyed E might continue no more; yet could they not obtaine the same. Whereby the humanity and valour of the Romans may appeare, and in especiall of Vespasian & Titus; that notwithstanding they had been so trauailed by the warres of the Iewes, and were so bitterly incensed against them, for that they had not by laying downe their armes submitted themselves, but had continued warre against them to the vttermost; yet deprived they them not of their afore-saide priuiledges, but surmounted their displeasure, which they had long before conceiued against them: and in like sort had not regard to the request of two so puissant cities, as Alexandria, & Antioch were:
In such sort as they granted nothing in fauour of them, neither ordained any thing in disfauour of those whom they had overcome in warre, to the intent to abolish one onely iot of those priuiledges which they had in times past; but said that they that had resisted them by armes, & who had F been overcome, were sufficiently punished for their obstinacie: & as touching those that had not committed any offence, they saw no reason to deprive them of their rights & prerogatiues. Wee knowe likewise, that Marcus Agrippa was of the same opinion, as touching the Iewes. For wheas the Ionians were sediciouſlie bent against them, and besought Agrippa that it might bee onelie lawfull for them to make vse of the priuiledge; which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greekes intituled by the name of God) had giuen them; requiring that if the Iewes were of their bloud, they might be tied to adore the same gods which the Ionians worshipped: Whenas therefore this matter was referred to the determination of the Iudges, the Iewes had the day; and obtained the libertie to liue according to their owne lawes and customes: and hee that at this time pleaded their cause, was Nicholas Damascene. For Agrippa pronounced, that it was unlawfull for them to innouate any waies: And if any man desire to haue exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twentie three, and twentie fourth booke of the histories of Nicholas. Neither ought this iudgement of Agrippa to seeme in any sort strange: for at that time our Nation had not by any wars procured the Romans displeasure. But vpon iust occasion may a man admire the magnanimitie of Vespasian and of his sonne Titus, who behaued themselves with such moderation after so great a warre, and so grieuous battels, as they had fought against vs.

Antiochus the great, king of Asia and Syria
vexeth the Iewes.

Now will I returne to my purpose, from whence I haue digressed. At such time as Antiochus the great reigned in Asia, the country of Iewry was grieuouly spoiled, and both the Iewes and the inhabitants of Coelosyria endured many miseries. For Antiochus making warre against Ptole- my Philopator and his son, called Ptolomey the Famous, they were pitifully perplexed: For whether Antiochus either ouercame or was ouercome, they were continually spoiled: so that betwixt the prosperitie and aduersitie of Antiochus, they fared like a shippe tossed and tormented with a storme. Finally, after Antiochus had ouercome Ptolomey, he conquered Iewrie. After the death of Philopator, his son sent a great army into Coelosyria vnder the conduct of Scopas, who seized a great number of those Citties; and our nation also was inforced by war and conquered by him.
Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, neere vnto the flood Iordan, and obtained the victory, discomfiting the greater part of his enemies armie; at which time Antiochus recovered againe those Citties of Coelosyria, which were before time surprized by Scopas. He tooke Samaria also: which when the Iewes perceiued, they submitted themselves of their owne accord vnto him, and hauing entertained him in the Cittie of Ierusalem, they gaue both his army and his Elephants abundance of prouision, and willingly assisted him with their forces, to subdue those garrisons which Scopas had planted in the fortresses of the higher Cittie. For which cause Antio- chus supposing it to be a matter behouefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardnesse which the Iewes had expressed in his seruice, wrote vnto his captai-nes and friends, signifying vnto them how forward the Iewes had been in his warres: and to expresse likewise what gifts he intended to bestow vpon them.

Hereafter I will insert the copy of his letters, which hee wrote in fauour of them, after I haue recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane writeth, answerable to this purpose, which I wil recite out of the sixteenth booke of his histories. Scopas (saith he) the generall of Ptolomey's army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one vvinter ouercome the whole nation of the Iewes. He reciteth also in the same booke, that after that Scopas had bene ouercome, Antiochus seized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, & Gadara; and anon after the Iewes, which dwelt at Ierusalem where the temple was, ioyned themselves with him: and although we are to speake more amply & particularly of that apparition that hapned neere vnto the temple; yet notwithstanding wee wil de-ferre the recitall thereof vntill another time. This is that which Polybius hath writtten. But to returne vnto our purpose: I will recite in this place the copy of those letters which were sent by the King Antiochus to Ptolomey, Health. Whereas the Iewes haue giuen vs a most apparant testimony of their affection towards vs, since the first time of our entrance into their country, & I haue magnificently entertained vs at such times as we were in person before their Cittie, by presents themselves before vs with all their Elders; and haue also furnished vs largely with all that which was necessarie for our fouldiers and our Elephants; and haue likewise taken armes with vs against the Egyptian garrison: we haue thought it a matter answerable to our honor, to afford the some satisfaction in repairing their Cittie, ruined by humane casualties, to the intent it might be inhabited and peopled againe, by gathering together those Iewes that are scattered abroad in diuers places, and planting them againe in the same. And in especiall (to the end that the seruice of God may be renewed) we haue set downe a certaine summe of money to be employed in sacrifici-ces, and in buying beasts for their offerings, vvine, oyle, and incense; that is to say, twenty thousand sicles of siluer; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one thousand, four hundred and sixtie measures of wheate, and three hundred, seauentie and five measures of salt. And my will is, that all these things that are abouenamed, bee deliuered vnto them according to the forme of our ordinance. We likewise commaund, that the worke of the temple be finished with the galleries, and other necessary buildings; and that all the stoffe of timber be brought out of Iudæa and other places, and especially out of Libanus, without any taxe or tallage: which exemption also shall take effect in all other necessities that are requisite towards the reparation of so fa-

A mousa temple. My pleasure likewise is, that all they of the same Nation gouerne their estate, according to their owne lawes. Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the temple also, and the singing men be freed from all taxations, that are paid by the powe, and the tributes of the crowne, and all other whatsoever. And to the end that the citie may be the sooner builded, I grant vnto all them that inhabit the same at this present, or that hereafter shall transport themselves thither within the moneth of October to inhabit, the same exemption of all charges for three yeeres space.
We forgive them, moreover the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recouer themselves of their losses. We will also that those Cittizens that haue been forcibly ledde from thence into seruitude, be set at libertie, both they themselves as also those that are of their alliance; commanding their goods to be restored vnto them. Farewell.

B These were the contents of this Letter. And to yeeld the more honour vnto the Temple, hee sent an Edict thorow all his kingdom to this effect: That it should not be lawfull for any stranger to enter within the inclosure of the Temple, without the Iewes permission; except those that should be purified, according to the law and custome of the place. That no man should bring into the Citie any flesh of hore, mule, wild or tame asses, leopards, foxes, or hares, or generally of any cattell prohibited to be eaten by the lawes of the Iewes. That it should not be lawfull likewise for any man to bring their skinnies into the Cittie, or to nourish any such beasts in the same; but that it might onely be lawfull to vse those beasts which might be sacrificed vnto God, according to the law of their ancestors. That whosoever should contradict those inhibitions, he should pay 3000 drachmes of siluer vnto the Priests. Furthermore, to expresse his pietie & fidelity towards vs, at such time as he heard of the troubles that hapned in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also vnto C Zeuxis gouernour of one of the higher prouinces, and his intire friend, commaunding him to send certaine of our nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing vnto him to this effect. King Antiochus to Zeuxis his father: Health. If thou art well, I am glad of it: Likewise am no lesse healthy. Vnderstanding that those of Lydia and Phrygia are newly grown to rebellion, I haue thought good (according to my dutie) to preuent the same: and whilst I consulted with my friends what was to be done, it hath bene thought fit that two thousand families of the Iewes, with all their hous-holds should bee sent thither, all which should be drawn out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in garrisons, and places of securitie. For I am perswaded of their good affection and zeale towards vs, both in respect of their deuotion towards God, as also for the testimonie which D our predecessors haue borne of them; namely, that they are faithfull, and ready to execute that wherein they are imploied. And although it be a difficult matter to remooue them, yet resolute I my selfe that it shall be done; and withall, I permit them to liue according to their lawes. Now when as they shall arrive in that place, thou shalt bestow on euery one of them places to build the houses on, with sufficient lands both for tillage and to plant their vineyards in: for which they shall pay no tribute for tenne yeeres space: and during such time as they may gather of their own for their sustenance, they shall be allowed their prouision of corne for them & their seruants. Our will is also that they, who shall be imploied in necessarie affaires, bee sufficiently prouided of that they need, to the intent that beeing so bountifullly dealt withall by vs, they may shew themselves the more affectionate in that which concerneth vs. Thou shalt giue order also to the vttermoost of E thy power, that this nation be no waies ouerpressed, or interested by any man. Farewell.

Hitherto haue wee sufficiently declared, what friendship Antiochus the great bare vnto the Iewes. After this, Antiochus contracted alliance and friendship with Ptolomey, who gaue him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and assigned him for her dowrie Coelosyria, Samaria, Iudæa, and Phoenicia: and for that these two kings diuided the tributes betwene them, the chieft in au-thoritie in euery Prouince, redeemed the exaction of their country, and paid the summe agreed vpon to the kings treasure.

At that time the Samaritanes puffed vp with their prosperitie, vexed the Iewes, spoiling their country, & leading them away prisoners perforce. This hapned vnder the high Priest Onias. For after the decease of Eleazar, Manasse his vncle obtained the Priesthood; & after the death of Ma- nasse, Onias the son of Simon surnamed the Iust, enioyed this dignitie. Simon was brother to E- leazar, as I haue heretofore declared. This Onias was of no great capacitie, & withall was very co-uetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty talents of siluer, which his predecessors were wont to pay to the kings of Egypt, of that tribute which the people paid vnto him. Whereupon F Ptolomey Evergetes, the father of Philopator, was grieuouly incensed against him; so as he sent an Embassador to Ierusalem to accuse him, for that hee failed to pay his accustomed tribute, threatning him, that if henceforward hee receiued it not; hee would diuide his country amongst his

Ioseph the sonne of Tobias preuenteth the imminent calamitie of the Iewes, & becometh Ptolomies friend.

IN a certaine man called Ioseph, the sonne of Tobias, and of Onias sister, who was the high Priest, beeing young in yeeres (but honoured in Ierusalem for his wisdom, foresight, and iustice) hauing certaine notice by his mother of the arriual of this Embassadour, came vnto the Cittie (for he had bene absent in the village of Phicala where hee was borne) and sharply reproofed Onias his vnckle on the mothers side, for that he did not any waies provide for the securitie of his Cittizens, but sought to draw his countreymen into a generall hazard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was leuiued for the tribute: Whereby he told him that hee had obtained the government ouer the people, and purchased the high priesthood. And that if he were so bewitched with money, that for the loue of the same hee could haue the patience to see his countrey in hazard, and behold his Cittizens also suffer all that which crueltie could inflict vpon them; he counsailed him to repaire vnto the king, and to require him to bestow the whole or the halfe of the tribute vpon him. Heereunto Onias answered, that he would no more execute the government, and that if it were possible for him, hee was ready to giue ouer the priesthood, I and that therefore he would not repaire vnto the king, because he was not any waies moued with these occurrences. Whereupon Ioseph asked him, if he would permit him in the peoples behalfe to goe Embassadour vnto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias answered that he gaue him free leaue. Vpon this occasion Ioseph went vp into the temple, and summoned the people to a generall assembly, exhorting them to be no waies troubled, and to conceiue no feare thorow the negligence of his vnckle Onias, requesting them to be confident in hart, and estranged from all sinister suspition; promising them that he himselfe would goe in Embassage vnto the king, & faithfully plead their cause before him, and perswade him that they had committed no insolent neglect, or contempt against his maiestie. Which when the people vnderstood, they gaue Ioseph hartly thanks. Whereupon he presently came downe from the temple, and honourably entertained the Embassadours K that came from Ptolomey, and hauing presented them with gifts of great price, and feasted them magnificently for many daies, he sent them backe to their Prince; assuring them that hee would in person follow them. And the rather was he incited to this iourney, because the Embassadour had perswaded him to repaire into Egypt, vnder such assurance, that he would obtaine all his requests at Ptolomeys hands; the rather for that he was won with the young mans free spirit & noble entertainment.

As soone as the Embassadour returned into Egypt, hee certified the king of Onias ingratitude, and Iosephs humanitie; certifying him that he wold come in person to intreat pardon for the people, for that offence they had committed against him; and the rather, for that he was in especiall L authoritie among the people: and so farre vsurped he vpon Iosephs praises, that both the king and the Queene Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithstanding hee was as yet absent. But Ioseph sent vnto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Hauing therefore furnished himselfe with apparrell, vessels, and horses, with the expence of almost twenty thousand drachmes, he arriued in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and gouernours of Phoenicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the king was accustomed euery yeere to sell them to the men of most respect in euery citie: These meeting with Ioseph on the way, began to mock at his basenesse and pouertie. But when hee came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the king was at Memphis, he set forward & went out to meet him. When as therefore the king, accompanied with the queene & Athenion his friend, who had discharged the place of Embassadour in Ierusalem, came M riding onward in his chariot; Athenion (who had bene honourably entertained by Ioseph) perceiving him vpon the way, certified the king that it was he, of whom hee had spoken vpon his returne from Ierusalem; protesting on his behalfe, that he was both a good and honourable young man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him about the rest, & made him mount his chariot. Where he was no sooner seated, but the king beganne to accuse Onias for that which he had committed. But Ioseph said vnto him: Pardon him, O King, and haue respect to his old old yeeres. For you know

A know that ordinarily old men & young children haue one and the same vnderstanding; but for our selues, who are young, you shall haue what you please to require without any pretext or cause of discontent. Hereupon the king tooke pleasure in the good behauiour and pleasant discourse of the young man, and beganne to loue him the more, as if hee had receiued a present attestation of his wisdom: whereupon hee commaunded that he should be lodged in his owne palace, & that daily he should accompany him at his princely table.

As soone as the king came backe to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria seeing Ioseph sitting neere vnto the king, were sore displeased: and the day drawing neere wherein they were to receiue the assurance of their tribute, they that were of the greatest reckoning in their Countrey farmed the same; so that the tributes of Coelosyria, Phoenicia, Iudæa, and Samaria, amounted together to B eight thousand talents. Whereupon Ioseph arising, blamed the farmers for that they had plotted amongst themselves to beate downe the price of the tributes, promising to giue the double; and that hee would likewise returne the forfeitures that were leuiued vpon the goods of such as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The king gaue eare to this discourse of his with great content, and said, that hee approoued the sale of these tributes vnto Ioseph, who in this sort augmented his reuenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could giue sureties: he made him answere with a bold courage: O king (said he) I will giue thee such pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and such as you cannot mistrust. When as therefore the King C instantiated him to produce them: I will (said he) O king, present thee for sureties, thy selfe, & the queene thy wife, that one of you may be a suretie for me to the other. Ptolomey smiling heereat, granted him the farme of the tribute, without further suretie. This fauour of his displeased those gouernours of the Citties that were come into Egypt, in that they saw themselves contemned & constrained to returne with shame vnto their houses. But Ioseph obtained two thousand footmen from the king, to the end to enforce the tribute from those Citties, who were negligent in their payments: and after he had borrowed five hundred talents of the kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria.

As soone as hee came to Ascalon, hee demanded the paiement of the tribute at the Cittizens hands, which they not onely refused to performe, but moreover vpbraided him with iniurious words. For which cause laying hold on about some twentie of the principals among them, hee put them to death: and hauing gathered their substances together, hee sent the king some thousand D talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomey admiring at his wisdom, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to dispose of all things at his pleasure. The Syrians vnderstanding hereof, were sore abashed; and perceiving that the Ascalonites were slaine by Ioseph, they threw the seueritie of his iustice and their disobedience, they opened him the gates, and receiued him willingly, and paid him their tributes. Whereas also the Scythopolitanes in way of contumacie refused to lay downe according to order, their accustomed tributes; he slew the chieftest amongst them: the confiscations of whose goods hee sent vnto the king. When as therefore hee had gathered much siter, and made great gaines of the purchase of the tributes, to the intent to establish and make his power of more continuance, he liberally employed his gettings; considering with himselfe that it was a part of wisdom to keepe and entertaine his good hap, by those E riches which he himselfe had gotten: For hee sent many presents both to the King and Queene, and bestowed liberall bountie both on their familiars and fauourites, and also on all those which had any authoritie, credite or fauour in the Court, to winne and bind them vnto him by his beneuolence. And in this felicitie of his continued hee the terme of twentie two yeeres; during which time he was the father of seuen children by the wife, and of another called Hirtanus, who hee begot on the daughter of his brother Solymus; whom he married vpon this occasion which ensued.

Walking vpon a time in Alexandria in the company of his brother (who ledde with him his daughter already marriageable, to the intent to bestow her vpon some Iew of good quality) whilst hee late at meat with the king, there entered into the banquet a certaine faire damsell, trained vp in F dauncing; with whom growing enamoured, hee told his brother thereof; praying him that sith by the lawes of their Countrey it was forbidden that a Iew might marry with a stranger; that hee would hide his fault, and be a faithfull assistant vnto him, to the end that hee might enjoy her whom his heart desired. His brother promised him to shew his willing forwardnesse heerein; and in the meane time hee adorned and decked his owne daughter, and brought her by night vnto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who she was, by reason hee had drunk ouermuch) and had her company. Which coming to passe diuers times, he was as yet farre more burningly burningly inflamed with the loue of this Dancer, and told his brother that hee was in danger to be enamoured all his lifetime; & that notwithstanding the King would not grant her vnto him. His brother told him that he ought not to vex himselfe, promising him that he should assuredly enjoy her whom he loued, and that already shee was his wife; opening vnto him how all things had hapned, and how he had rather wrong his owne daughter then to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Ioseph had praised the kind & naturall affection of his brother towards him, hee tooke his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath beene said. Who being thirteene yeeres old, gaue testimonie of that naturall spirit, and dexteritie that was in him; by reason whereof his brethren conceiued a certain hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled the in all things, & had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate him. Whereas therefore Ioseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest iudgement, and vnderstanding; he sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned backe vnto him rude, and illettered, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, he sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desert place distant from the high way some 7 daies iourney, & gaue him with him three hundred couple of oxen, to fowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

When as therefore he came vnto the place, and perceiued that the yokes were missing, hee asked aduise of some of the husbandmen: who counsailed him to send some one backe vnto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would be spent in sending backe a messenger, deuised a cunning expedient stratageme, more then might be expected from one of his yeeres. For he caused tenne couple of oxen to be slaine, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the skinnies, and fashion couples thereof, and hauing yoked his oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home vnto him. Who loued him the more intirely, by reason of his wisdom, and the subtiltie of his vnderstanding; praising besides that his resolution and execution, esteeming him the more, for that he was his onely true son, to the generall discontent of the rest.

VWhen as therefore newes was brought vnto Ioseph, that about that time king Ptolomey was blessed with a young sonne, and how all the chiefe Lords of Syria, and the countreys vnder his obedience, repaired to Alexandria in great pompe to celebrate the birth day of the kings sonne; hee being of himselfe vnable (by reason of his age) to repaire thither, hee sould his children, whether any one of them would goe and visit the king. When as therefore the eldest sonnes had excused themselves, and made refusall to vndertake the iourney, pretending that they were insufficient ability to performe the message, and all of them gaue counsaile that their brother Hircanus might be sent: Ioseph tooke great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would goe to king Ptolomey: who promised to vndertake the iourney, and told his father that he needed no great sum of money to performe the voyage; because in the way hee would trauell frugally, and content himselfe for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Ioseph was very glad to heare of his sonnes prudence; & after Hircanus had kept silence for a while, hee counsailed his father, that hee should not present the King with any thing out of Iudaea, but that hee should write vnto his father in Alexandria, commanding him to deliuer such summes of money as he thought conuenient to buy that which he found to be most magnificent & of best esteeme in that Citie. Ioseph imagining with himselfe, that perhaps he would onely employ some tenne talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsaile, wrote vnto his father Arion (who had the vse of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering vp his money in Syria, he was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the kings tributes were to be paid, hee commaunded Arion to defray the same. Hauing therefore letters of credence vnto him, he iourneyed towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote presentie vnto all the Kings friends, that by some meanes they would make him away.

As soone as hee was arrived in Alexandria, and had deliuered his fathers letters to Arion, Arion asked him how many talents he would haue? hoping that he would craue but ten, or some little ouerplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth, and reproued him for his prodigality, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with much trauell, & thrifty sparing; & refusing his demands, hee praiued him to imitate his fathers example who had begot him: & in a word hee told him, that hee would deliuer him no more then ten talents; & that for no other vse, then to buy gifts to present the king withall. Whereupon Hircanus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra, praying

tended against Hircanus.

Asking her that shee would moderate the young man (for Arion was in great estimation with the Queene, who for this cause acquainted the king with the matter. Whereupon Ptolomey sent for Hircanus, and said vnto him; that hee misreuelled that being sent vnto him from his father, he had not as yet visited him; and besides that, he had committed his fathers agent to prison: hee therefore commaunded him to yeeld him a reason thereof. Whereunto he answered, that there was a law among the Iewes, that no man should taste of the sacrifices that had not first of all visited the temple, and sacrificed vnto God; and that in that respect he had not hitherto visited his maiesty, because hee expected certaine presents to present his Highnes with from his father, who was his bounden seruant. Furthermore, hee alledged, that he had punished his fathers seruant, because hee had disobeyed his commandement, which he ought not to doe, whether his master were either noble or ignoble: and if (said he) we chastise not such men, as they haue deserued, expect (O King) that you also shall be neglected by your subiects.

When Ptolomey heard these words, hee began to smile, and wondred at the magnanimitie of the young man. Arion perceiuing that the king held himselfe satisfied, and that he was like to haue no assistance at his hands, deliuered Hircanus the thousand talents, and by this meanes was he set at libertie. Some three daies after, Hircanus came and saluted both the king and Queene, who entertained him graciously, and feasted him kindly, for the affection sake which they bare vnto his father. He priuily enquiring among the marchants, bought one hundreth young lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age, paying a talent for euery one; and the like number of virgins for so many talents. Being therefore invited to a banquet by the king, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, because that (by reason of his young yeeres) they had assigned the places, according to euery mans dignitie, made small accompt of him. Now when as all the guests, after they had eaten their meates, laid all their bones before Hircanus, so that the table was loaden round about him, a certaine pleasant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whose merry conceits and jests the king very willingly listned vnto) during the time hee was at meat, being solicited by those that were at the table, came vnto the king and said vnto him. See here my liege, what store of bones are before Hircanus: hereby you may coniecture, that his father hath flected all Syria, as he hath bared these bones of flesh. The king laughing at Triphons words, asked Hircanus how he came by so many bones before him? Not without great cause (said he) O king; for dogges deuoure the flesh with the bones, as these doe (in which speech he glanced at those who sat with him at the table, because they had no bones before them) but men eat the flesh, and cast the bones away, as I do, because I am a man. The king wondring at his discreet answer, commaunded all the rest to applaud him, in approbation of his witty vrbanity.

The next day he sought out all the kings friends, and the principals in court, and saluted them one by one, enquiring of their seruants, what presents they would court the king with vpon the birth of his sonne? Who told him, that some of them would giue twelve talents, and other some that were in dignitie, would present him according to their ability. Whereupon Hircanus made a shew of discontent, in that he wanted power to offer such a present, pretending that hee had no more but five talents. All which these seruants presently reported to their masters: who were very ioyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceiued that Ioseph should be blamed, and would offend the King throw the abiectnes of his present. Now when the day of the solemnity was come, and they likewise that pretended to present the king most magnificently, offered no more then twenty talents: Hircanus presented the hundreth young Lads hee had bought, to the King; and the virgins vnto Cleopatra: for whom hee had paid a talent by the pottle. At this unexpected magnificence of his gift, all men were amazed: but besides this, he gaue gifts of diuers talents to the king and Queenes fauourites and seruants, and their attendants; whereby hee warranted himselfe from the danger that might fall vnto him by their meantes. For the brothers of Hircanus had written vnto them, to murder him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this young man, and willed him to aske what soeuer gift he best liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would please the King to recommend him, by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the King had singularly honoured him, and had giuen him many bountifull rewards, he wrote vnto his father & his brethren, and all his gouernours, and commissaries, and in that sort sent him away. His brothers hearing newes how hee had in all things highly contented the King, and that hee returned with great glory, they issued out to meet with him, with an intent to murder him, with their fathers knowledge. For hee being displeased with him, by reason of his aboue named large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yett he could not be his dissonner for feare of the king. But when his brothers came and encountred him on the way, he slew diuers of those that accompanied them, & two of his brethren also were left slaine vpon the place, and the rest fled vnto Ierusalem vnto their father. And when as vpon his repaire vnto Ierusalem, he perceiued that no man entertained him, he waxed afraid, and departed presently from thence to the other side of Iordan, where he past his life in receiving and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus surnamed Soter the sonne of Antiochus the great reigned in Asia. At that time also died Ioseph, Hircanus father, who was a man of good conceit and great courage; who established the people of the Iewes in their entire peace, and hath released them from pouverie and many disasters, & had held the tributes of Syria, Phoenicia, and Samaria for the space of twenty two yeeres. His vnckle Onias died also about the same time; leaving the Priesthood to his sonne Simon; after whose death, his sonne Onias was made high priest: to whom Arius king of Lacedemon sent an embassage and letters, the copie whereof H hereafter ensueth.

The friendship and societie of the Lacedemonians, with Onias the high Priest of the Iewes.

The letter of the king of Lacedemon to the high priest of the Iewes. 1. Machab. 12.

A Rius King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We haue found out a certaine writing wherein it is recorded, that the Iewes and Lacedemonians are of the same race, and both of them descended from Abraham. It is therefore requisite, that since you are our brethren, that you giue vs to vnderstand wherein we may pleasure you. The like will we doe also, and will repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours, shall in communie be yours. Demoteles our messenger bringeth you our letters foulded in square, the scale whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. These were the contents of the Lacedemonians letters. After the death of Ioseph it came to passe, that the people began to mutine in the quarrell of his children. For the elder brethren made warre against Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the people were diuided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the high Priest Simon also, by reason of his affinity with them, followed their party. Whereupon, Hircanus resolved to repaire no more vnto Ierusalem, but fixing his habitation on the other side of Iordan, he made continual warre against the Arabians, slaying a great number of them, and taking many prisoners. He builded a huge tower of white marble from the bottom to the top, K and on the same planted he the figures of many liuing creatures in sculpture of great height. About the same hee drew and forced a deepe trench of flowing water; and hauing hewed the front of the rocke that stood opposite against his building, he made diuers caues therein, many furlongs long. He made also diuers chambers therein, both to eate, sleepe, and dwell in. He drew thither likewise currents of springing water, in so great abundance, that it gaue much delight to those that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of euery caue was so little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made so narrow, because they might the better serue for his securitie and refuge; that if so be he were at any time assailed by his brethren, he might auoid the danger of surprisall. Moreover hee builded many huge halles, which he adorned with great and goodly gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him L Tyre; and is situate betwene Arabia and Iudæa, on the other side of Iordan, not farre from the country of Essebonitis. He commaunded in this country some seuen yeeres, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whose death, his brother Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdom. Ptolomey also king of Egypt (who was likewise called Epiphanes) died, & left two children very yong behind him, of whom the eldest was called Philometor, and the younger Phiscon. When as therefore Hircanus perceiued Antiochus grew mighty and strong, and feared to be punished by him for his executions done against the Arabians, hee slew himselfe with his owne hands, and Antiochus enioied all his goods.

A Nias the high Priest being dead about this time, Antiochus gaue the priesthood to his brother. For that sonne, vnto whom Onias had left the succession, was as yet verie yong (of whom we will speake in conuenient time and place.) This Iesus (Onias brother) was deprived of the priesthood, thorow the kings displeasure conuicted against him, who gaue

A gaue it shortly after to his yonger brother called Onias. For Simon had three sonnes, who, as we haue declared, successiue possessed the priesthood: this Iesus caused himselfe to be called Iason, as his other brother caused himselfe to be called Menelaus, whereas his name was Onias. But Iesus, who had first of all bene established in the place of the high Priest, arose against Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were diuided into factions, and Tobias sonnes were on Menelaus side: but the greater number of people followed Iason: so that Menelaus and the sonnes of Tobias being grieuouly vexed by them, retired themselves to Antiochus, giuing him to vnderstand, that it was their intent to forsake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the kings, and to liue after the maner of the Greeks; exhorting him to giue them licence to erect a place of Exercises in Ierusalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them, they so demeaned themselves, that there appeared no more signe of Circumcision in them; so that at such time as they were naked, there was no difference betwene them and the Greekes, and neglecting all the ordinances and customes of their country, they conformed themselves to the behauiour and manners of other nations. Antiochus hauing all things in his kingdom, according to his hearts desire, resolved to make warre in Egypt; desiring to bee possessed of the same, both for that he contemned Ptolomeys sonnes age, (who was as yet weake) as also for that they were not as yet capable to manage their so mighty estates. Arriuing therefore neere to Pelusium with a great power, he circumvented by a subtil policie the yong Ptolomey Philometor, and subdued Egypt: for after he had besieged Memphis and taken the same, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to besiege the Citie, and to lay hold of the king who was therein. C But he was driuen, not onely from Alexandria, but also out of all Egypt, by the summons that was sent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and dislodge his armie out of that country, as we haue heretofore declared in an other place. Now will I more largely and particularly discourse the actes and gests of this king, who ouercame Iudæa, and spoiled the temple: For hauing onely made a briefe mention of him in my former workes, I thinke it necessarie in this place to make a more exact recitall of his Historie.

CHAP. VII.

Antiochus leadeth out his army against Ierusalem, taketh the Citie and spoileth the Temple.

D

A Fter that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the feare of the Romans had forsaken that country, he led his army against Ierusalem, and encamped before the Citie, and surprisid it by surrender, in that the gates of the Citie were set open vnto him by those of his faction: all which hapned in the hundreth, fortie and third yeere of the raigne begun by Seleucus. Now when he saw himselfe Lord and master of Ierusalem, hee slew diuers of the contrarie faction; and after he had gathered together many great and rich spoiles, he returned backe to Antioch. This misfortune hapned some two yeeres after the surprisall of the Citie, in the hundreth, fortie and fise yeere of the raigne of that family, on the fise and twentieth day of that moneth which we call Chasseu, and the Macedons Apellaus, the Romans December; in the hundreth, fiftie & three Olympiade; at which time he neither spared them, who gaue him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, & effected him the meanes to spoile the inestimable riches of the temple, with greater freedom: but beeing no lesse tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, hee spared neither. For hauing seene what quantitie of gold was in the temple, and how huge a number of presents and precious ornaments were in the same, hee was so ouercome with couetousnesse, that hee brake and violated all conuentions and conditions. After therefore hee had spoiled the temple, and carried away the vessels dedicated vnto God, the golden candlestick, the golden altar, the table of the shew bread, the censers, & pulled downe the curtaines made of fine linnen and scarlet; after hee had emptied the treasures that were hidden, and left nothing behind him of any valew: he drowned all the Iewes in grieuous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbad them to offer their vsuall and daily sacrifice vnto God, according to the prescript order of the law: and after he had spoiled the whole Citie, he slew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the rest of them into captiuitie, with their wiues and children, to the number of ten thousand. Furthermore, he burned the fairest buildings of the Citie, and raised the walles, and raised a fortresse in the lower Citie. For the temple was as it were a high citidell, commanding the rest. For this cause, hauing inclosed it with high walles and towers, he planted a garrison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scumme of the wicked Apostate Iewes, who were giuen ouer to all impieties, & who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischievous injuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and ordinance of the Iewes. Hee constrained them likewise to forsake their deuotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he reuerenced for Gods, building in euery Citie and Borough both Temples & Altars, on whom he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbade them likewise to circumcise their children, threatening to punish him whoeuer he were, that was found to doe the contrary. Moreover, he chose certaine ouersers that should constrain them to fulfill his commandement; so that a great number of Iewes, some of their owne accord, other some for feare of the threatned punishment, endeouored themselves to satisfie the kings decree. But those men who were of vpright hearts, and valiant minds, little respected these menaces: For hauing more respect to their lawes and customes, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced, if they performed not the edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruell punishment, for many daies, amidst the which they yielded vp the ghost. For after they were whipt & maimed in their bodies, they were crucified & tortured aliuie: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the neckes of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred scripture, they defaced and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruell death.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Iewes, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, I and called their temple of Garizim no more the temple of God, but (as we haue heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt & vnconstant natures, and challenged their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent embassadours to Antiochus with letters to this effect; To King Antiochus the mightie God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem. Our ancestors enforced by the continuall pestilence chat raunged in their country, & induced by a certaine auncient superstition, haue been accustomed to obserue that day as festiuall, which the Iewes call their Sabbath; and hauing builded on the mount of Garizim a temple, & dedicated it vnto a God, who hath no name, haue offered vp in the same diuers & solemn sacrifices. But since that you haue inflicted punishment on the Iewes, according as their wickedness deserueth, the commissaries of the King supposing that we were tied to their customes (by reason of some alliance betwene vs) couple vs with them, and charge vs with the same accusations: whereas we are borne Sidonians, as it appeareth by the rolles of our commonweale. We therefore beseech you, who are our benefactor and Sauour, to command your gouernour Apollonius, and your steward Nicanor, not to molest vs any more, by charging vs with those accusations which appertaine vnto the Iewes: who neither are tied vnto vs by alliance, neither accord with vs in manners; but that our temple, which hath not hitherto borne the name of title of any God, may now be called the temple of Iupiter of Greece: by which means we shall be deliuered from all trouble, and being at libertie to intend our affaires, we may the easier & more willingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritans the King answered, sending them backe their owne letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor; Health. The Sidonians of of Sichem haue sent vs this suggestion; which wee annex vnto these our letters. Since therefore they, who were sent vnto vs to this intent, haue sufficiently approued both to vs and our counsell of friends, that they are utterly strangers vnto those crimes, wherewith the Iewes are charged, and are desirous to liue according to the lawes of the Grecians, wee abolute them in as much as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of Iupiter of Greece: wee haue written to the like effect also to Apollonius our Magistrate. Giuen the forty and sixt yeere, and the cleuenth of the moneth Hecatombæon, which signifieth August.

CHAP. VIII.

Antiochus forbiddeth the Iewes to use their lawes: onely Matthias the sonne of Asimonæus contradicteth him, and obtaineth the victory against Antiochus captaines.

That same time there dwelt a certain man in Modin (a village of Iury) whose name was Matthias, who was the sonne of Iohn, and who was the sonne of Simon, the sonne of Asimonæus a priest of the ranke of Isarib, borne in Ierusalem: This Matthias had five sons,

Iohn

The year of the world, 3799, before Christ's birth, 165. The zeale and piety of Matthias and his sonnes.

A. Iohn called Gaddi, Simon called Matthes, Judas called Machabæus, Eleazar named Auron, and Ienuthas called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained vnto his sonnes, as touching the miserable estate of their Common-weale, the sacke of their Citie, the sacrilege of the Temple, and the miseries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the law, then to liue in ignominie. When as therefore the Commissaries deputed by the King, came vnto the Borough of Modin, to constrain the Iewes to performe that which was enioyned them, and to command them to sacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who surpassed the rest in honor, and other qualities, but in especiall in excellencie of descent and nobilitie) to begin first of all to offer sacrifice, to the end that the rest might follow him & be induced by his example; promising him that in so doing, the King would honour him greatly: Matthias answered thereunto, that he would in no sort commit that idolatry, assuring the thar notwithstanding al other nations of the world, either in respect of loue, or for fear of iustice should obey the edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither hee, nor any of his children could or would be induced to forsake their fathers religion. Now as soone as he had returned this answer, and held his peace, a certaine Iew stepped forth to offer sacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in such sort displeased, that both he and his sonnes fell vpon him, and with their Iwordes hewed him in peeces. He slew Apelles the kings captain likewise, with certain other soldiers, who would haue withstood him. And not content herewith, he ouerthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice: If (said hee) any one be affectioned to the lawes of his fathers, and the seruice of God, let him follow me: and this said, he sodainly retired himselfe into the desert with his sons, leauing the borough utterly dispossessed. The rest doing the like, retired themselves into the desert, with their wiues and children, and made their habitation in certaine caues. The kings captaines hauing intelligence hereof, gathered those forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Ierusalem, and pursued the Iewes into the desert. And hauing ouertaken them, they laboured first of all, to make them submit themselves, and to make choice of that which stood with their profit, rather then to indaunger themselves, and inforce them to chastise their disobedience, with blood in war. But the Iewes respected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands, who had already concluded and resolved among themselves, rather to die then commit such an impietie: For which cause they (who omitted no opportunitie) assailed the Iewes on a Sabbath day, and burned them within their caues, who neither eslied their enemies, nor so much as closed vp the mouths of their caues: And therefore abstained they from all defence by reason of the day, resolving with themselves in no sort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to cease from all labour, on that day.) There were therefore about some thousand stifled in their caues, accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithstanding, diuers escaped, who ioined themselves with Matthias, whom they appointed likewise for their captaine; who declared vnto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath daie, assuring them that if they did it not, but scrupulously obserued the law, they themselves should be enemies vnto themselves, if perhaps the enemy should assaile them that day, and should not stand vpon their garde: for by that means they should be destroyed without resist. By these words he perswaded them to doe as he had said: and vntill this day it is a custome among vs, that if need require we make no difficulty to fight on the Sabbath day. Matthias therefore hauing assembled a sufficient number of men about him, destroyed the Altars, and slue those that had forsaken their religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For diuers were scattered heere and there among the nations, for the feare they had; these commaunded hee to circumcise their children that were not circumcised; driuing those from euery place, whom King Antiochus had ordained to see his lawes executed.

After therefore Matthias had gouerned for the space of one yeere, hee fell sicke of a most desperate disease; for which cause he called for his sonnes, and spake vnto them after this manner. My sonnes, I must now walke the way that is destinated vnto all men: I therefore commend and exhort you to follow my deliberation, and diligently to obserue the same, remembering you of the intent of me your father, who haue begot and nourished you, which is, to maintain the lawes of our country, and to establish our estate, which is vpon the point to be ouerthrowen, except you submit vnto those who either voluntarily or forcibly betray the same: shew your selues therefore to bee worthy sons of me who am your father, strengthen your hearts with courage to ouercome all force and necessity; thinking with your selues, that if God see that you be such, hee will not forsake you, but taking pleasure in your vertue, he will once more graunt you the fauour to recouer your former peace and liberty; and will establish you in assured possession Iudas Machabeus ouercometh Apollonius in battell.

Seron gouernor of Coelolyria is put to flight in Iudæa.

When Apollonius, who was Antiochus generall in Samaria heard hereof, hee gathered his army together, and invaded Iudæa: against whom Machabeus made head, & ouercame him in a battell, wherein there died many, and among the rest Apollonius, whose sword Machabeus got as his part in the spoile. There were a great number of them also who were wounded, and much bootie was taken in the enemies campe: after which execution enriched with spoiles, he retired himselfe. But Seron gouernour of Coelolyria hearing hereof, and vnderstanding that diuers had ioyned themselves with Iudas, and that hee had already about him a sufficient power to keepe the field, and bid the battell; hee thought that it concerned him to begin to punish those, who resisted the kings Edicts. For which cause, after hee had assembled all the forces that he had, and besides them hired certaine apostate or fugitiue Iewes, he marched forth against Iudas, and came as farre as Bethoron a village in Iewry, where hee incamped. Iudas also came out to meete with him, determining with himselfe to bid him battell: and seeing that his souldiers would hardly be drawne out to fight (both by reason of their inequalitye of number, as also for that they had eaten no meate, but had fasted a long time) he encouraged them, saying, that the meanes to obtaine victorie, and to haue the vpper hand ouer their enemies, consisted not in the greatnes of their number; but in their deuotion towards God: wherof they had a most euident example in their forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a small number of men diuers thousand of their enemies, because they fought for iustice, for their law, & for their children: for the greatest force (saied he) that a man may haue, is to be innocent and without iniurie. By these words perswaded he his souldiers, so that without any feare of the multitude of their enemies, they altogether ranne vpon Seron, and encountering with him, they discomfited the Syrians. For their chieftaine being slaine, all the rest betooke them to their heeles, in which thing only consisted the safetie of their liues. Iudas therefore, pursuing them as farre as the champaigne, slew about eight hundreth of them. The rest saued themselves in those quarters that bounded vpon the sea.

CHAP. XI.

Lysias and Gorgias lead their armies into Iewry, and are overthrowne.

When King Antiochus heard these tidings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, and hiring diuers strangers & mercenary Islanders, hee prepared himselfe to invade Iudæa about the spring time. But after the muster of his army, when he truly found that his treasures failed him, & that he was in great scarcitie of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his owne nature a man of a great & magnificent spirit, that he could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolved first of all to goe into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affaires with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as gouerned all the countrey from Euphrates, as farre as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giuing him likewise a part of his army and some of his Elephants. To him had the king giuen charge to see his sonne Antiochus well and carefully trained vp, vntill his returne: commanding him expressly, that when he had conquered Iudæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaues, and sell them to those that would giue most, & destroy Ierusalem, and utterly abolish that race. The king hauing giuen this charge to Lysias, led forth his armie towards the countrey of Persia, in the hundreth, fortie and seauenth yeere: and after hee had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the gouernours of the higher countrey.

As for Lysias, hee chose Pholomey the sonne of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authoritie amongst the kings friends) and gauethem forty thousand footmen, and seuen thousand horsemen, to invade Iewry. Who marching as farre as the citie of Emaus, encamped in the plaine field, and strengthened their army with diuers allies out of Syria, & of the countreies thereabouts, and with diuers Iewes also, who were Apostataes. There came also certaine Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Giues with them to manicle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

When Iudas had viewed the campe, and numbred the enemy, he encouraged his souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to inuocate and call vpon him, according to their law, and that clothing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed manner in such extreme dangers, and call vpon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so dooing, God would haue compassion on them, and giue them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battell, according to the ancient custome of his countrey, by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for feare lest such men being too niggard of their liues, or distracted by such affections, should not fight courageously: he stood vp in the midst of them, inciting his souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words; My countremen and companions, neuer haue wee hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to expresse our courages, and contemne our dangers, then at this present. For at this time, if you fight courageously, you may recouer your libertie: which of it selfe is so acceptable vnto you all, that beeing of it selfe most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to be affected, because by it onely you shall win the meanes to serue God.

As therefore you shall be disposed at this time, you may obtaine the same, & withall enioy a happy life (which consisteth in liuing according to our lawes and ancient customes) if you behaue your selues valiantly: but if you proue cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremities of infamie, and hope no lesse then the vter extermination of all your race. Think therefore with your selues, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your selues that in fighting for your libertie, for your lawes, and for pietie, you shall obtaine immortall glorie: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you may bid your enemies battell. Thus spake Iudas to his army, to encourage them.

Whilst thus hee was intent about the future battell, certaine tidings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and five thousand footmen, to the end that (vnder the conduct of some fugitiues, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set vpon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to breake into the enemies army, especially for that he knew that their forces were diuided. Hauing therefore refreshed both himselfe & his army somewhat liuely, and left a number of fires in his campe, hee marched all the night, and sought out the enemy, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiving that the Iewes had forsaken their campe, supposed supposed that they were retired for feare into the mountains to hide themselves: For which caules trauailing onward, he determined to search diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Judas accompanied with three thousand men (who were slenderly armed by reason of their poverty) shewed himselfe vnto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after hee had fornied and seene their warlike discipline, and mightie number, and how souldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithstanding that they should be naked: for although they were in that estate, yet God (who tooke pleasure in the greauesse of their courage) had already given them the victorie against a number of armed souldiers: and suddainly he commaunded the trumpets to sound, to that rushing in vpon his enemies on the suddaine, he dismayed them, and discomfited their hearts. And after he had slaine di-uers of them who resisted, and put all the rest to flight, hee pursued them as farre as Gadara; and the Plaines of Idumæa, of Azor, and of Iamnia. In this countrie there died about some three thousand of the enemy. Notwithstanding, Judas would not permit his souldiers as yet to take the benefit of the spoile, because they were as yet to fight against Gorgias & his army; assuring them, that as soone as they had valiantly executed the same, it should be lawfull for them to make their booty, without feare, because they should haue no further enemies either to feare or expect.

Whilſt hee spake in this sort vnto his souldiers, they that were with Gorgias discovering from and that their camp was on fire: for although they were farre off, yet did the smoake assure them that Judas and his fellowes in battel ray expected their comming, they feared, and betooke them to flight. When as therefore Judas perceived that Gorgias troups were discomfited, without stroke stricken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after hee had gotten together great store of gold, siluer, scarlet, & purple, hee returned to his dwelling place, with ioy, praising God for their happy successe: for this victorie did not a litle aduantage them, towards the attaineement of their libertie. But Lyfias being confused at the discomfiture of those whom he had sent, assembled an other armie of almost three score thousand chosen men, & five thousand horsemen, to invade Iudæa. After he had therefore made his entrie by the mountaines, hee encamped in Bethsura, a village of Iudæa.

Judas hauing knowledge thereof, came forth against him, accompanied with tenne thousand men; and discovering the number of his enemies farre to exceed his (after he had besought God & by prayer that it would please him to fight with him) hee charged the vaunguard of the enemy with lo great force, that he discomfited them, & slew about some five thousand of them, leaving the rest in great feare. Lyfias knowing the resolution of the Iewes, and how they were prest to die, except they might liue in liberty; on the other side redoubting their desperations, more thē their forces, he gathered together the rest of his army, and returned back to Antioch: where he sojour-ned, hiring many forraigne souldiers, to make a greater army & preparation to invade Iewry with-all. After that Antiochus captaines had been discomfited so many times, Judas assembled the people together, and told them, that after they had obtained so many victories thorow the mercie of God, it behoued them to ascend vnto Ierusalem, and to purifie the temple that was desolated; and to offer thole sacrifices ordained by the law. Ascending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the temple desert, and the gates thereof burned, and grasse growing within the same, thorow desolation. Being therefore confused with so pitious a spectacle, he began to weepe with all those that accompanied him: And hauing chosen out certaine of his best souldiers, he commaunded them to enforce the garrisons that were in the fortreſſe; whiles hee himselfe purged the temple. Which command of his being exactly and resolutely fulfilled, hee sent for new vessels, a candleſticke, a table, an altar of incense, all made of gold. Hee put also vailles or hangings to the doores, accustomed to be ſpred abroad; and ſet gates to the temple. And hauing thrown downe the altar of burnt offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of sorts of stones, neither hewen, nor hammered according to arte. The five & twentieth day of the mo-neth of Chasleu (with vs September) there were lights sette vpon the candleſticks, and perfumes laid vpon the altar, & loaves imposed vpon the table, and sacrifices offered vpon the new altar. All which hapned the same day three yeeres wherein before time the sacred Religion was changed into prophane and hatefull impietie. For the temple was ruinated and left desolate by Antiochus, and remained in that estate for the space of three whole yeeres. For this desolation hapned in the hundredth, forty and fift yeere, & the five and twentieth day of the moneth called Apellæus or At-guſt; in the hundredth, fiftie and three Olympiade: and the temple was repaired on the ſameday, desolation of the temple hapned, according as Daniel had foreprophecied, foure hundred & eight yeeres before: for he declared euidently that the Macedonians should destroy the same.

After that Judas had reſtablished the seruice of the temple, both hee & his countymen solemnized a feast for eight daies, omitting not any kind of honest pleasure, banquetting them sumptuously and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes & Psalmes. Thus reioyced they at this reſtablishment, seeing that contrary to all hope after so long time, they had recovered the cu-stomes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: so that a decree was made for those vvich should come after, whereby it was commaunded, that for the space of eight daies the rebuilding of the temple should be solemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: and euer since B that time vntill this day we celebrate this feast, called the feast of Lights; for this cause in my opinion, for that this so great felicitie began to shine vnto vs as a light, contrary to all hope. Hee inclosed the Citie like wife with a wall, and builded high towers thereon, in which hee planted garrisons against the incursions of the enemies. He fortified the Citie of Bethsura also, that it might serue as a fort against the enemy.

Whilſt these things passed thus, the nations round about displeased with the reſtablishment and force of the Iewes, oppressed diuers, whom they surprized by ambuſhes and treacherie. On those Judas made continuall war to hinder their incursions, and to make them partakers of those evils they had inflicted vpon the Iewes. So that invading Acrabathan, hee slew the Idumæans that were delcended from Eſau, and brought away a great prey out of their countrey, and shut vp C the sonnes of Baan their prince, who lay in waite for the Iewes; and hauing besieged them, hee ouercame them, setting fire on their towers, and killing all the men that were therein. After this he departed from thence, and made war vpon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty armie, vnder the conduct of Timotheus. These did he encounter with and overcome, & tooke their Citie of Iazor, and burned it, and led away their wives and children into captiuitie, & afterwards returned into Iudæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, assembled themselves together in Galaad against the Iewes, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who hauing retired themselves to the fort of Dathema, sent letters vnto Judas, giuing him to vnderstand, that Timotheus intended to surprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requested him to deliuer them from this danger. And whilſt he was reading of these letters, certaine messengers came vi-D to him out of Galilee, giuing him to vnderstand, that they were assaulted by the inhabitants of

Judas fighteth with the Ammonites, Simon against the Tyrians, and others, whom he discomfith.

E Judas bethinking himselfe of that which best concerned him in these two vrgent and instant occasions, commaunded his brother Simon to take three thousand chosen men with him, and to goe and succour those Iewes that were assailed in Galilee: and himselfe, accompanied with Jonathan his other brother, and eight thousand fighting men, repaired vnto the countrey of Galaad; leaving the government of the rest of the forces in the hands of Ioseph the sonne of Zachary, and with Azarias, commanding them to haue a carefull & diligent eye to Iudæa, and not to enter battell with any one, vntill his returne. Simon arriuing in Galilee, fought against his enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that ſcidd as farre as the gates of Ptolemais, he slew about three thousand: and after he had gathered the spoiles of such as were slaine, hee ſet many Iewes at libertie, who were prisoners; & hauing restored them their goods, retired himselfe backe againe to his countrey. But Judas Machabæus, & F Jonathan his brother hauing past Iordan, and marched on the other side thereof for the space of three daies, encountered with the Nabatheans, who peaceably came out to meet them; by who he vnderstood the estate of those that were in Galaad, and how diuers of them were in extreme penury, inclosed and besieged in Castles and Cities of the countrey by their enemy. Who likewise belought him to make haste and encounter the strangers, & to seeke the meanes to ſaue their countymen. For this cause hee returned into the desert, and first of all assailed the inhabitants of Bofra, and tooke their Citie, & ſet it on fire, killing all the men that were therein, who were able to beare armes. Neither was he contented therewith; but whē night drew on, he marched towards another Castle where the Iewes were inclosed, and shut vp by Timothy and his armie; and attaining the same about the mornings brie, he surprised the enemy, at such time as they were raising their ladders to scale the walles, and addressed their engines for battery; whereupon he caused the trumpet to be sounded, and after hee had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfullie for their kinsmen and friends being in great danger, and had distributed his forces into three battalions, he set vpon the enemies rereward. Timothus soldiers perceiuing that it was Machabæus, whose valour and good hap they had already approued to their great losse, they without delay tooke themselves to flight. But Judas with his army followed after the, & slew about eight thousand of them, and marching towards Malla (a citie of the enemies) he surprised the same, & slew all the men therein, and afterwards consumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, hee tooke and destroyed Chalpoma, Bofor, and diuers other places in Galaad.

Anon after Timothy leuied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his succour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his passed hee the flood, and encamped neere vnto a towne called Rapha, exhorting his souldiers to behaue themselves like valiant men against their enemies the Iewes, & to hinder their passage ouer the streame: foretelling them, that if they should win the passage, both hee & his were assured of the worst. Judas vnderstanding that Timothus was prepared to fight, tooke with him all his forces, and marched hastily against the enemy; so that hauing passed the riuer he set vpon them, killing diuers of them that resisted, and grievously affrighting the rest, who casting away their armes, were constrained to flie. There were some of them, who saved themselves by swiftnesse of foote: and some also, who retired themselves into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be secured: and so to escape: but after that Judas had taken in the Citie where the temple was, he slew them, and burnt the same, enforcing his enemies to suffer diuers and dreadfull sorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Iewes, their wiues & children, & substance, and brought them with him into Iudæa. When as therefore he drew neere vnto the towne of Ephron, which was situate directly in his way, so that it was impossible for him to march any other waies or returne home, except they leuelled their way (which they refused to doe) hee sent Embassadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free passage thorow their citie. For they had made Baricadoes of stones to cut off the passage. When as therefore the Ephronites would giue no eare vnto him, he besieged their Citie for a day and a nights space, and tooke and burned the same, and slew all the men that were therein, and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and so great a number was there of those that were slaine, that hee marched vpon the bodies of dead men.

After they had past Iordan, they came into a great Plaine, wherein the Citie of Bethsan (by the Greekes called Scythopolis) confronted their eyes; from whence they departed & came into Iudæa with ioy and gladnesse, singing and praising God, and vsing their accustomed pastimes & songs of victorie. This done, he offered vp sacrifices of thanksgiving for their happy successe, and the safetie of his army; for that in all those battels and encounters he had not lost one Iew.

In the meane while two captaines, to wit, Ioseph the sonne of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garrison of Iudæa (whilst Simon went into the country of Galilee against those of Ptolemais, and Judas and Jonathan his brother were in Galaad against the Ammonites) desired also for their part to obtaine the honour and reputation of valiant men of warre by some notable exploit; tooke their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Against these issued out Gorgias, who was Gouverneur in that place, & charged them in such sort, as the Iewes lost some two thousand men, and fled as far as the marches of Iudæa. This mischief fell vpon them, because they had disobeyed Judas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his returne. For besides many other projects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that hee foresaw that if they should attempt any thing contrary to his commaund, they should haue but bad successe therein. Judas and his brethren making warre against the Idumæans, gaue them no respite, but continually charged them on euery side: they tooke also the Citie of Chebron, and destroyed all the fortifications in the same, & burnt the towers, spoyling all the country of the enemies, and rased the Citie of Marissa likewise. Afterwards comming to Azot, they tooke & spoiled it, and carried away a great quantitie of bootie from thence, and returned backe into Iudæa in safetie, ioyfull of their victorie.

CHAP. XIII.

The death of Antiochus Epiphanes in Persia.

AT that time Antiochus trauiailing along the higher countries of his kingdome, vnderstood that there was a very wealthy Citie in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a rich temple of Diana, replenished with all sorts of presents: wherein also he was informed, that Alexanders armes and curers, who was Philip king of Macedons son, were reserued there of long time. Vpon these considerations he was incited to repaire vnto Elymais, which he besieged & laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof, were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his siege, but sustained the same valiantly, he failed of his purpose. For they draue him from their citie, and falling out vpon him, they pursued him so hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and lost a great number of his men. Whilst thus he was discomfited, for that he had been frustrated of his hope, newes was brought him of the overthrow of his captaines, whom he had left to warre against the Iewes, and how they of Iewry were now the stronger, and had the vpper hand. This trouble seconding his former discontent, he was surprised with despaire, and fell sick; which sicknesse aggravated with other accidents, increased in such sort, that he knew well that he should die: and for that cause he called for his most familiar friends, and certified them, that his sicknesse was violent and desperate, and that hee was seized with such affliction, for that hee had tormented the people of the Iewes, and destroyed their temple, committed horrible sacrilege, & contemned the reuerence of God: and whilst thus hee spake vnto them, he gaue vp the ghost. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwise praise-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would haue spoiled the temple of Diana in the country of Persia. For sith hee had onely intended to commit sacrilege, but had not effected it, he merited not to suffer punishment for the same. And if it seemeth good vnto Polybius, that Antiochus was punished by death for this occasion, it is far more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the sacrilege hee had committed in the temple of Ierusalem. But our purpose is not to argue against those that maintaine, that Polybius reasons are of greater truth and consequence, then ours are.

Antiochus Eupator discomfited the Iewes, and besiegeth Iudas, and smiteth him up in the Temple.

BEfore Antiochus gaue vp the ghost, hee called for Philip one of his chiefest familiars, and made him gouernor of his kingdome. And hauing deliuered the diademe into his hands, he put on his roiall robe, and his ring with other iewels, he charged him to beare and deliuer them to his sonne Antiochus, requiring him earnestly to haue care of his bringing vp, and to maintaine the kingdome in his behalfe, vntill he coming vnto the yeeres of discretion, were fit to manage it himselfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred, fortie and ninth yeere of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lysias had certified the people of the kings death, hee proclaimed his sonne Antiochus, whom at that time hee had in his protection, king, furnaming him Eupator (according to the instructions that were giuen him.) About that time, the garrisons & Apostataes that were in the fortresse in Ierusalem, did much mischief vnto the Iewes. For setting vpon those at vnawares, who ascended the temple to worship and offer their sacrifice, they slew them: for the fortresse commaunded the temple. For these causes Judas resolved to cut off these garrisons, and to that intent hee assembled all the people, and besieged it. This enterprise was vnderooke in the yeere one hundred and fiftie, after that Seleucus had vsurped the gouernment of those countries. Hauing therefore made him certaine engines, and raised diuers rammes, hee industriously continued the siege: But diuers of those Apostataes that were reuolted, and of that garrison, issued out by night, and assembling together such men as were of so malicious nature as themselves, they came vnto king Antiochus, requiring him that he wold not suffer them to be abused in such sort by those of our nation, nor so carelessly neglected by them, considering their disgrace grew by his fathers seruice, for whose sake they had forsaken their own religion, & followed his lawes and ordinances. Furthermore they intreated, that the fortresse was in danger to be surprised by Judas, and his associates, except some present succours were sent vnto them. VVhen Antiochus the younger had notice hereof, he was sore displeased, and sent for his captaines & friends, commanding

CHAP. XV.

Antiochus giueth over his siege from before the Citie, and entreth a league and alliance with Iudas.

Wherupon Antiochus sent a herald to Iudas and those that were besieged with him, promising the peace, with permission to liue according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and hauing taken an oath & assurance frō the king; they surrendered vp the temple. Vherupon Antiochus entred the same, and seeing it to be a place so wel fortified, he contrary to his oath, commanded his army to leuel the wall that enuironed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with him the high priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the king to murther Menelaus, if he minded that the Iewes should liue in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the author of all these euils, by reason of the counsaile he had giuen to Antiochus his father, to enforce the Iewes to forsake their religiō. The King for that cause sent Menelaus vnto Bercea, a citie of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enioyed the high priesthood for the terme of ten yeeres. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his onely ambitious desire of authoritie had enforced our nation to reuolt from their religion. As soone therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made high priest, who was called Iacimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slewe him. But Onias the sonne of the high priest (whom as we haue heretofore declared, was left an Orphā in his infancy) seeing that the king had slaine his vnclie Menelaus, and giuen the priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Lysias, he fled vnto Ptolomey King of Egypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queene Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signorie, where hee builded a temple like vnto that which was at Ierusalem: whereof wee shall heereafter haue more fit opportunity to speake.

CHAP. XVI.

Bacchides generall of Demetrius army, commeth to make warre against the Iewes, and returneth backe againe vnto the king without performance of anything.

AT that time Demetrius, Seleucus sonne fled to Rome, and tooke possession of Tripolis in Syria, and after he had set the diademe vpon his head, and had leuiued and hired certaine souldiers, he inuaded the kingdom: where he was received to the generall content of all men, who submitting themselues vnto him laid hold on the king Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them alieue vnto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two yeeres, as we haue already declared in an other place. To this new elected king, diuers Iewes (banished for their impietie) and with them the high priest Alcimus made their resort: who in general accused their nation, and as principals Iudas and his brethren, obiecting against them, that they had slaine his friendes, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the kingdom and expected his comming, some of them were slaine; and that the rest being driuen from their native countrey were banished into other places: requiring him that hee would send some one of his friendes to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Iudas and his brethren. Demetrius was much moued by these reports of theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose gouernment at that time all Mesopotamia was committed;) To whom he gaue an army, ioyning with him the high priest Alcimus, with commission to kill Iudas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his army, came into Iudæa, and sent a certaine herald to Iudas and his brethren; to intreat with him vpon certaine articles of peace, because his intent was to surpriue them by some subtiltie and treacherie. But Iudas smelling his drift, gaue little trust vnto him: for in that hee came thither with so great an army, hee easily coniectured that he intended no peace; but to make warre: notwithstanding some of the people gaue eare vnto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their cotriman, they submitted them-ding them to hire strange souldiers, and all those in his kingdom, who were of yeeres to beare armes; so that he gathered in short time an army of one hundred thousand footmen, and twentie thousand horsemen, and thirtie two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed hee out of Antioch, committing his army to Lysias direction. As soone as he came into Iudæa, hee went vp vnto Bethsura a walled Citie, and very difficult to be surpriued, which he besieged and began; but with such disadvantage, that the Bethsuriens resisting him valiantly, & sallying out vpon him, burned those preparations & engines which he had furnished for the batterie of the towne. Where as therefore a long time was consumed about this siege, Iudas hauing intelligence of the kings approach, raised his campe from before the Castle of Ierusalem, & marching forward to meet the enemy, hee shut his army in a certaine streight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, some 70 foulds distant from the Enemies campe.

The king hauing tidings hereof, raised his siege from Bethsura, & marched toward the streight wherein Iudas army was inclosed, and about the morning he set his souldiers in battell array. He first of all caused his Elephants to march one after another thorow the streight (for that it was impossible for them to march in square.) About euery Elephant were one thousand footmen, & fife hundred horsemen. These Elephants bare high towers on their backs, garnished with Archers. Touching the rest of his forces, he caused them to ascend two severall waies by the mountaines, vnder the conduct of his most intrest friends, commanding them with a huge shout and cry to charge their enemies, & to discover their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Iewes: whereupon, the mountaines resounded with fearfull cries of Antiochus army: Yet was not Iudas any waies amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, he slew almost fixe hundred of the forlorne hope. But Elezazar, surname Auranus, Iudas brother, seeing a huge Elephant among the rest armed with roiall trappings, and supposing that the king was vpon the same, he ran against him with a mighty courage, and after he had slaine diuers of them that enuironed the Elephant, & scattered the rest, hee thrust his sword into the belly of the beast, & wounded him to the death: so that the Elephant falling vpon Elezazar, slew him with the waight thereof; and thus nobly died this woorthy man, overthrowing a great number of his enemies, thorow his infinite valour. Iudas seeing his enemies forces so great in number, retired backe to Ierusalem to continue his siege; and Antiochus sent part of his army to Bethsura to surpriue the same, and with the rest hee himselfe marched onward to Ierusalem.

Elezazar Iudas brother killeth an Elephant. Iudas returneth to Ierusalem, and Antiochus followeth him. The Bethsuriens yeeld vp their citie. The Temple of Ierusalem besieged.

The Bethsuriens being affraid of this mighty army of the king, and seeing their necessary provisions failed them, yeelded vp their Citie, after they had taken the kings oath, that they should receiue no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this Citie, he offered them no iniurie; onely hee thrust them out disarmed from the Citie, and planted a garrison therein. Hee spent a long time also in besieging the temple of Ierusalem, for that they who kept the same, defended it valiantly. For against euery engine the king builded & raised vp against them, they erected a contrarie engine. Their onely want was victuals, because their old prouision was consumed, and the ground had not bin manured that yeere because it was the seauenty; in which, according to the law, the countrey and soile should not be stirred: which was the cause that diuers of those that were besieged, fledde secretly for want of victuals, insomuch that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this estate were they who were besieged in the temple.

When as King Antiochus and Lysias the generall had receiued tidings, that Philip coming out of Persia, intended to make himselfe master and Lord of the countrey; they concluded to giue ouer the siege for that time, & to march forward against Philip, without giuing any inkling thereof either to his souldiers or captaines. He onely commaunded that Lysias should communicate the same with the capitaines, without discovering of his deliberation or enterprise against Philip; and to tell them that for these reasons hee leuiued the siege: first, for the length thereof; next, for the strength of the place; lastly, for want of victuals, and for many affaires that required some circumspet and carefull foresight in his kingdom: Furthermore, for that hee thought it most expedient to capitulate with the besieged, and contract friendship with all the nation of the Iewes, promising and permitting them the exercise of their religion, because they onely rebelled for that they were deprived of the same; and for that he was assured, that hauing the grant thereof, they would each of them returne into their owne countreies. When Lysias had expressed and published these reasons; all the armie and the capitaines approved the same.

Hauing therefore receiued an oth from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers should any waies bee endamaged by them, they committed themselves to their protection. But Bacchides setting light by his oth, slue three score of them; & by this breach of his faith towards these, hee caused others (who intended to submit themselves) to forsake and fly his gouernment. As soone as therefore hee had remooued his army from Ierusalem, hee came vnto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of those which had fled, and some others among the people, he slue them all, commaunding all those that lived in the country to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place for the gard of his person a part of his army: and that done, hee returned vnto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the meane while Alcimus intending to assure his estate and gouernment; and supposing that it should bee so much the better confirmed, if so be he could obtain the good wil of the people, he vied all kind of plausible & familiar speech vnto them; & deuising with euerie man pleasantly & graciously, he adioyned in short time great forces to those which he had before: amongst whom there were many fugitives and vngodly men, by whose help and assistance he marched thorowe the country, killing all those whom hee found to be of Iudas faction. Iudas perceiuing that Alcimus hauing gathered great forces, had already slaine diuers of the most vprightest men, and such as feared God in all his nation, hee addressed himselfe also to ouerunne the country, and slue as many of Alcimus partakers, as he could meet with. Who perceiuing in himself that he was vnable to resist Iudas, made his account to recouer Demetrius fauour. For which cause hee repaired to Antioch, and incensed Demetrius grieuouly against Iudas, accusing him for inforcing many iniuries against him: protesting that he should endure farre more, except hee were preuented and punished by a good army I sent out against him.

Nicanor being sent after Bacchides to be chieftaine of the warre against Iudas, is discomfited with all his army.

Demetrius imagining, that if Iudas should increase in power, it should bee some preiudice to his estate, he sent Nicanor his most intire and faithfull friend, to make war against him: (who was one of them also, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Hauing therefore furnished him, in his owne opinion, with a sufficient army, and able to make head K against Iudas, he commaunded him to spare no one of that nation. As soone as Nicanor came to Ierusalem, hee intended not incontinently to make warre vpon Iudas, but cast with himselfe to surpris him by some subtiltie: to this intent he sent him a peaceable message, alledging that it was neither necessarie nor conuenient for him to fight or hazard his fortune; protesting vnto Iudas, that he would offer him no iniurie; and that hee resorted thither with his friends, onely to expresse the good affection of king Demetrius towards him, and how wel hee was affected towards the nation of the Iewes. Iudas and his brethren beleecued this false embassage of Nicanors, and suspecting no kinde of sinister dealing, they gaue him credite, and entertained both him and his armie. When as therefore Nicanor had saluted Iudas, he conferred with him, and in the meane while gaue a signe vnto his souldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiuing and discovering his L treason betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled vnto his souldiours. When Nicanor sawe that his intent and subtiltie was discovered, hee resolved to make open warre vpon Iudas, and to bid him battell neere vnto a borough called Caphar-salama: in which place obtaining the victorie, he constrained Iudas to retire himselfe into the fortresse in Ierusalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the siege of Iudas in the temple of Ierusalem, certaine of the Priests and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reuerence, they shewed him those sacrifices, which (as they said) they intended to offer vnto God for the kings prosperitie and health. But he blaspheming, threatned them; that if the people did not deliuer Iudas into his hands, he would destroy the temple vpon his returne, and with these menaces he departed out of the citie. Which when the Priests heard, they began to shed abundant rears, praying God that M it might please him to defend his sacred temple, together with those which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

When as therefore Nicanor departing from Ierusalem arrived neere vnto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great supply of soldiers came vnto him out of Syria. Now Iudas was encamped in an other borough called Adas, about thirtie furlongs distant from Bethoron, hauing with him at the most not about one thousand men. Notwithstanding he exhorted

A exhorted his souldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies, neither to thinke with themselves against how many they were to fight; but against whom, & for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether courageously set vpon the enemy, at such time as he should lead them forth to the onset. Whereupon assailing Nicanor, there arose a dangerous conflict betwene them; wherein Iudas had the vpper hand: for he slue a great number of the enemy, and finally Nicanor himselfe fighting courageously was slaine; and as soone as hee fell downe dead, his army betooke them to flight. For hauing lost their chieftaine, they dispersed themselves, and cast away their weapons: Iudas speedily pursuing them, made a great slaughter, and by sound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that he had discomfited the enemy. Whereupon the inhabitants thereabout vnderstanding hereof, betooke them to their weapons, and meeting with those that fled in the forward, slue them, so as no one escaped from this battell: notwithstanding they were to the number of nine thousand. This victorie hapned on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countymen call it, and the Macedonians Distre: And heereof each yeere there is both a solempne feast and memoriall obserued. Fro this time forward the nation of the Iewes were in quiet without any inuasion, & lived in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combats and dangers. Whereas therefore the high priest Alcimus intended to beate downe an olde wall of the sanctuary, which had bene builded by the holy Prophets, hee was sodainly strooken by God, so that hee incontinently lost his speech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured grieuous torments for diuers dayes, at last hee died miserably: after hee had enioyed the Priesthood for the space of foure yeeres.

After his death, the people with a generall consent gaue his place to Iudas. Who vnderstanding of the great power of the Romanes, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spaine, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Persens and Philip, and besides all these, the great King Antiochus, determined to make friendship with them, and sent Eupolemus the sonne of Iohn, and Iason the sonne of Elenazar his two intire friends vnto Rome, to intreate the Romanes to be their allies and confederates, and to write vnto Demetrius, that hee should giue ouer to war against the Iewes. When the Embassadors that were sent from Iudas, were arrived in Rome, the Senate entertained them; and after they had discoursed with them vpon the occasion of their Embassage, they accepted and concluded vpon their alliance, and made a decree, the copy whereof was then brought into Iudaea, and the original referred in the Capitoll, engraued in a Table of Brasse. Which arrest or decree of the Romanes, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare vnto the Iewes, contained these articles. That no man vnder the obedience of the Romans, should maintaine warre against the nation of the Iewes: neither should furnish them with victuals, shippers, or siluer, who should make warre vpon them. And if any enemies should assaile the Iewes, the Romans should giue them succours to the vitermost of their power. And that likewise if any one should make warre against the Romanes, the Iewes should succour them. That if the Iewish nation would adde or diminish any thing of that association, it should be done with the common aduise of the people of Rome, and that that which should bee ordained, should remaine irreuocable. This arrest was written by Eupolemus the sonne of Iohn, and by Iason the sonne of Elenazar, at such time as Iudas was high Priest, and his brother Simon generall ouer the armie. See heere how the first amitie and alliance was contracted betwene the Romanes and the Iewes.

CHAP. XVIII.

Bacchides is sent once againe into Iudaea, and obtaineth a victorie.

When as Nicanors death, and the discomfiture of his army was reported to Demetrius, he sent a new army into Iudaea, vnder the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and repairing to Iudaea, encamped in Arbela a city of Galilee: where hauing inforced, conquered, and taken a great number of those that were retired into caues, hee departed from thence, and repaired in all haste to Ierusalem. And vnderstanding that Iudas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out against him with twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horsemen. Now Iudas had not on his side in all about two thousand men, who perceiuing the multitude of Bacchides soldiers were afraid; so that some of them forsaking their camp, fled away: by which means there remained no more with Iudas, but eight hundred men. Seeing himselfe therefore abandoned by so many of his men, and pressed by his enemies, who gaue him him neither truce nor time to reassemble his forces, he resolved to fight with those eight hunanswered, that they were insufficient to make head against so huge an army, and counselled him to retire, and to stand on his guard for that time, vntill hee had gathered forces that might be able to confront the enemy. But Judas replied to this effect: God forbid (said he) that the Iewes should see mee turne my backe vpon mine enemies. And if by this meanes I meete with my death, and that I must needs spend my last blood in this battell, I will neuer foyle for many notable actions so worthily achieued, nor staine so much glorie obtained with so great vertue by one ignominious flight. And hauing in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those souldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselves altogether against the enemy.

BUT Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battell, placing the horsemen both the wings; his light armed souldiers and archers in the front of the army; and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and hee himselfe led the right wing of the battell. And in this array he approached Judas campe, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding all his souldiers to giue a great shout, & to charge their enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruell conflict, which continued vntill the sunne-set. And when as Judas perceived that Bacchides & the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certaine number of his most resolute followers, and drew towards that quarter, and setting vpon them, hee brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them hee forced them to flie, and pursued them as farre as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiving the flight of those in the right, went after Judas, and enclosed him on the backpart. He being vnable to flie, and seeing himselfe enclosed by his enemies, resolved with his souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore hee had slaine a great number of his enemies, and being infeebled more through wearinesse, then by the wounds re-ceiued of them, hee fell to the ground, and was himselfe at last slaine likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploits. His souldiers seeing him dead, and hauing no gouernour of respect left amongst them after the losse of so valiant a captaine, betooke them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers vpon intreatie recou-ered his bodie, and carried it to Modim (a place where his father was buried) there was hee enter-red by all the people, who wept for him diuers daies, and honoured him publicly according to the custome of their country. Such was Judas ende, who was a valiant man, a great warriour and verie respectiue of the commandements of his father Matthias, hauing done and suffered all that he might for the libertie of his country. Being therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he hath left behinde him a perpetuall renowne of his worthy actes, and an honourable memorie of himselfe obtained by the libertie, in which he reestablished his nation, retying them from the seruitude of the Macedonians: who died also after hee had discharged the office of the high priest, for the space of three yeeres.

CHAP. I.

Jonathan after the decess of his brother Judas, succeedeth him in the gouernment.

WE haue declared in our former booke, how the nation of the Iewes (after they had been vnder the subiection of the Macedonians) reco-uered their libertie: wee haue likewise discovered the great and grie-uous conflicts, which Judas their captaine performed, and in which hee finally died in the behaile of their libertie: how likewise (after the death of Judas) at the wicked Apostate Iewes, who had requiered from their religion, tooke courage, molesting and doing many iniuries to the rest of their countriemen. Finally, how besides their malice, the famine inuaded the country;

rey; so that diuers being vnable to sustaine these two mortall scourges of famine and warre, G were constrained to submit themselves vnto the Macedonians. In the meane while, Bacchides gathering together the false Apostates (who were fallen from the religion of the Iewes, with an intent to liue after the prophane manner of the Paganes) committed the gouernment of the countrey vnto them: who laying hold on Iudas friends and partakers, betrayed and deliuered them to Bacchides: who first of all tormented and beate them at his pleasure, and afterwards put them to death. This so grievous affliction (then which the Iewes had neuer endured a worse, since their returne from Babylon) was the cause that those of Iudas faction, who were yet aliue, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addressed themselves to Jonathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Iudas vertues, & to haue no lesse care of his countremen, the other had; who fought for their libertie vntill his latest breath, requiring him not to abandon the gouernment of his nation, especially in that so miserable estate wherein they were pliged. Jonathan answered them, that he was ready to die for them; and being in all things esteemed no lesse valiant and politique then his brother Iudas, he was proclaimed generall and chiefe of the Iewes.

Jonathan by the publike instigation of the Iewes vnderstandeth the gouernment.
Bacchides complotteth to betray Jonathan & his brother.

Bacchides hauing notice hereof, feared least Jonathan should be no lesse infestuous to the king and Macedonians, then his brother Iudas before him had bene; for which cause hee sought the meanes to make him away by treason. But both Jonathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence hereof; and hauing discovered his practise, they tooke all their families with them, and fled into the desert that confined the Citie Ierusalem: and retiring themselves neere vnto a water called the lake of Alphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceived that they mistrusted him, and were drawne thither; hee went out against them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other side of Iordan, he gathered his army together. Jonathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seeke him, sent his brother Iohn (surnamed Gaddis) vnto the Arabians Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their goods vnto their hand, vntill the end of the warre betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whilest therefore Iohn marched towards the Nabatheans, the sonnes of Amarau laid an ambuscado for him (who were of the citie of Medaba) and after they had furiously set vpon him on the way, & laid hold on whatsoeuer hee brought with him, they at length slew him and all his companie: for which fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his brethren, as we will make manifest in that which afterward followeth.

Bacchides draweth out his forces against Jonathan. Iohn the brother of Iudas is slaine by Amarau sonnes. Bacchides assaulteth Jonathan on the Sabbath day, & loosed two thousand of his men.

When Bacchides knew that Jonathan was incaped in the marshes of Iordan, he made choise of K the Sabbath day to set vpon him, hoping that he would not defend himselfe on that day, because of the prohibition of the law. But hee contrary to his expectation encouraged his companions, & declared vnto them how it concerned their liues to be valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut vp in the midt betwixt the flood and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the flood on their backs. As soone therefore as hee had made his prayer vnto God, that it might please him to grant him the victorie, hee set vpon the enemy with a stout courage, and slew a great number of them: and perceiuing Bacchides how with great fierceness he set forward against him, he stretched out his right hand to strike him; but hee preventing the stroke by stepping aside, Jonathan and his companions leapt into the river, and so saved themselves by swimming ouer to the other side of Iordan, because the enemies durst not passe the water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Ierusalem (after he had lost about some two thousand of his men.) After this, hee fortified diuers Cities (which were before time ruined) namely Iericho, Emas, Ethero, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in euerie one of them certaine towers, and great and strong walles, and afterwards he planted garrisons therein to sally out vpon the Iewes & vex them; but in especiall he fortified the citadel of Ierusalem, in which hee kept for hostages the children of the principallest men of Iudaea.

The castle of Ierusalem fortified.

About that time there came a certaine man to Jonathan and his brother Simon, bringing them newes that the sonnes of Amarau would solemnize their nuptials, and were to lead the bride from the Citie of Gabaia, which was daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians: M for which cause she should be conducted with great magnificence and sumptuous pompe. Jonathan and his brother, supposing that a fit opportunitie was offered them to reuenge their brothers death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done vnto their brother, they tooke with them the greatest forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba; where they lay in ambush vnder the couert of a mountaine. But when they saw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroom, and a great troupe of their friends likewise, according to the accustomed

A customd manner of marriages, they brake out of their couert, and put them all to the sword; and after they had seized their Iewels, and all other bootie of that company that followed them, they retired backe againe ioyfully hauing obtained their purpose: and thus reuenged they the death of their brother Iohn vpon the sonnes of Amarau. For not onely these alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wiues and children, were all of them slaine, to the number of foure hundred. And in this manner Simon and Jonathan returned into the marshes aforesaide, and abode there. But Bacchides hauing fortified all the garrisons of Iudaea, returned back vnto the king. And at that time the estate of the Iewes was in peace for the space of welny two yeeres.

But the wicked, and such as were reuolted from the religion of the Iewes, seeing that Jonathan and his followers conuerfed in the countrey in great assurance, by reason of the peace; they sent certaine Embassadors vnto king Demetrius, requiring him to send them Bacchides, who might apprehend Jonathan, declaring that it might easily bee done, and that in one night breaking in vpon them, hee might murder them all before they were aware. When Bacchides, by the kings commaundement came into Iury, he wrote vnto all his friends both Iewes & also his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Jonathan: but when by no policie nor prowells of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Jonathan hauing notice of their ambushes, stood vpon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was displeased with the Apostates or fugitiues, objecting against the that they had deceiued both the king and him, and laying hold on fiftie of the principallest of them, hee put them to death. But Jonathan and his brother, with those of their company, retired themselves vnto Bethalaga (a certaine village in the desert) for feare of Bacchides, in which place he builded towers, and walles to keepe his garrison in more securitie. Bacchides vnderstanding hereof, tooke the army that hee had with him, and those Iewes that were his confederates, and marched forward against Jonathan; where battering those fortifications that were made by him, he besieged him for many daies. But Jonathan for all his busie siege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but resisted him valiantly; & leauing his brother Simon in the citie to make head against Bacchides, hee secretly stole out, and gathered a great number of foldiers that fauoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides camp; and after he had there slaine a number of them, hee gaue his brother Simon notice of his coming: who, as soone as he heard the noise in the enemies campe, hastily issued forth with his souldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians engines, and for his part also made a great slaughter of them. Bacchides seeing that hee was circumvented by his enemies, and that both before and behinde hee was pressed by them, being astonished at this so hard, so daime and vncexpected encounter, was almost out of his wits; so fore was he confused at the issue of his siege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cause he discharged all his choler vpon those Apostates, supposing hee was abused by them, who had sent vnto the king and had caused him to bee sent thither: and full gladly would hee haue returned home, could hee but make an ende of the siege without his dishonour.

Demetrius by the solicitation of the fugitiues sendeth Bacchides against Jonathan with an armie. Bacchides displeased with the Apostates for that they could not surprise Jonathan killeth fiftie of them. Jonathan and his brother besieged in Bethalaga.

Jonathan stealing out of the citie assaulteth Bacchides by night. Bacchides reuengeth himselfe on the fugitiues, and is enforced to retreat.

Jonathan constraineth Bacchides to make peace with the Iewes, and to depart out of the countrey.

BVt Jonathan knowing his deliberatiō sent an Embassador vnto him to conclude a peace and amitie betwixt them, with this condition; that they should each of them deliuer vp those prisoners that were taken on either side. Bacchides supposing that his request would be to his great honour, and that a fit occasion was now offered him, wherupon he might raise his siege without any disgrace, promised Jonathan his friendship; so that both of them swore from that time forward neuer to make warre the one against the other; and each of them both received, and restored their prisoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch vnto his King, and after that retreat hee neuer made warre againe vpon Iudaea. But Jonathan hauing obtained this securitie, went and dwelt in the towne of Machmas; where administering and gouerning the common weale, he executed such seuerie iustice on those that were reuolted from the religion of their countrey, that hee cleansed the nation of all such kind of men;

IN the hundreth and sixtie yeare, Alexander the sonne of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and seized the Citie of Ptolemais, by the treason of those soldiers that were therein; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that he granted no man access vnto him: for being locked vp in a royall fort fenced with foure towers (which himself had builded neer vnto Antioch) hee suffered no man to approche his presence, but was carelesse and wholly negligent in his affairs; living in pleasure and idleness: whereby he grew into great hatred amongst his subiects, as wee haue already declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolemais, hee gathered all his forces and marched forth against him.

1. Machab. 10.

After he sent Embassadors vnto Ionathan, that might confirme an alliance & ratifie a friendship betwixt the: for he determined with himselfe to preuent Alexander, for fear least he capitulating with him first of all, should obtain his assistance. And this did he especially for the fear he had of Ionathan, least remembering those injuries hee had before time received at his hands, he should oppose himselfe against him. He therefore sent vnto him requiring him to assemble his forces, & to make preparation for the warre: commanding likewise, that those Iewes should be delivered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut vp for hostages in the fortresse of Ierusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himselfe in this sort, Ionathan resorted to Ierusalem, and in the presence of all the people, and of the garrison that was in the fortresse, hee read the Kings letters; and after the reading thereof, the cursed and reuolted Iewes that were in the fortresse were fore afraid, seeing that the king permitted Ionathan to leaue an army, & to receiue the hostages. But hee receiving them into his hands, restored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this meanes remained Ionathan in Ierusalem, where hee made diuers reparations and buildings, according as him pleased. For he builded the Citie walles of hewen stone, to make them more forcible against the assaults of warre. Which when they perceived who were in the garrisons throw out all Iudaea, they forooke them all, & retired back into Antioch, except they that were in the Citie of Bethsura, and those in the fortresse of Ierusalem: for they conspired for the most part of those Iewes that had abandoned their religion, who for that occasion feared to forsake their garrisons.

BUT Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made vnto Ionathan, and being well assured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himselfe against the Macedonians; moreover how he was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: Hee told his friends and familiars that it was impossible for him to meete with a better allie at that time then Ionathan, who had approoued himselfe a valiant man against his enemies, and for particular causes bare hatred against Demetrius, from whom he had receiued many injuries, and on whom hee had wrought sundrie reuenges: for which cause if they thought it good to draw him vnto their side against Demetrius; the time was verie fit to entertaine and confirme a mutuall peace betwene them: which aduise of his being approoued by his favorites; hee sent a letter vnto Ionathan to this effect. King Alexander to Ionathan his brother, Health: We haue long since vnderstood of your valour and fidelitie, which hath caused vs to send our Embassadors vnto you, to intreat with you of alliance and amitie betwixt vs; and from this day forward, wee elect and ordaine you high priest of the Iewes, & receiue you into the number of our chiefe friends. Moreover in way of present, I send you a purple robe, and a crowne of gold, exhorting you, that since you are thus honoured by vs, you will in like sort yeeld vs an answerable respect and friendship. Ionathan hauing receiued this letter inuested himself in the habite of the high Priest, and the day

A Of the feast of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth yeere after the death of his brother Judas. (For during all that time there had not been any high priest.) He assembled also a great number of soldiers, and caused a great quantity of armors and weapons to be forged.

When Demetrius heard these newes, hee was much troubled, and accused himselfe of sloth and too much negligence in looking to his affaires, for that hee had not preuented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Ionathan; but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. He sent letters likewise to Ionathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Ionathan, and to all the nation of the Iewes: Health. Since you haue obserued the friendship that you beare vnto vs, & haue not entangled your selues with our enemies, nor withstanding their diuers sollicitations, wee praise your fidelitie, and pray you to perseuere in the same

B estate, assuring you that you shall receiue the like fauours from vs, in all integritie. For I will forgive you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you haue vntill now paid, either to the king, or to my predecessors, or to me; and from this time forward, I acquite you from those tributes which you were wont to pay hereafter. And moreover, I release you of the price of sale, and of the gold which you were wont to give vnto vs for our crowne. Vee likewise acquite you of the third of the fruit of your lands, and the halfe of the fruit of your trees, which heretofore you haue been accustomed to pay me, to keepe and hold them peaceably from this time forward. I acquite you also at this present for euery, of all that which the inhabitants of Iudaea, and the three provinces annexed thereto, Samaria, Galilee, and Peraea, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the Citie of Ierusalem be held sacred, and to haue the right of the freedome, exempt from all tributes

C and tenths, both in it selfe, & also all the countrey belonging thereto. And I commit the fortresse in the same to the hands of Ionathan the high Priest, permitting him to plant such a garrison therein, as in his opinion shall be held both honest and lawfull; and such as will faithfully maintaine it to his vse. I will also that all the Iewes, who are imprisoned in my countrey, be set at libertie. Moreover, it is my pleasure, that no horses of the Iewes be taken vp to runne post for vs: I grant also on the Sabbaths, and other festiual daies; yea, three daies also before euery one of those feasts, libertie and freedome be vsed. And my will is, that the Iewes, who inhabit within my dominions, be likewise freed of all molestations. The like priuiledge grant I them that will beare armes with me, to the number of thirtie thousand; who in what place soeuer they shall be, shall haue no worse entertainment then mine owne army: and part of them will I place in my

D garrisons; the rest shall be of my guard; and I will make them captains in my court, and will permit them to liue according to the ordinances of their countrey, which they shall obserue. & I will also that the three governments annexed to Iudaea be made subiect vnto the same lawes. My pleasure is in like manner, that the high Priest, shall take order; that no Iew adore in any of the temple thons in Ierusalem, and of my owne charge I giue euery yeere a hundredth and fiftie thousand stiles of siluer to be employed in making sacrifices: and that which shall be ouer and aboue those sacrifices, my pleasure is that it shall be yours. Moreover, I acquite the Priests and ministers of the temple, of the ten thousand drachmes of siluer (which the kings leuied on the temple) because they appertaine vnto the Priests who serue in the temple; as I haue been rightly formed.

E within the precincts thereof (whether it be for money due vnto the king, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof, and receiue not any damage in their goods. I permit also, that the temple be repaired and builded at my charge. My will is also, that the walles of the Citie be repaired, and that certaine towers be builded about the same, at my costs. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build fortresses and strong holdes in through all the countrey of Iudaea, and to place garrisons in them, my will is that all this be done and fortified, at the charges leuied out of mine owne coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made vnto the Iewes.

But king Alexander hauing gathered great forces, as well of strange & hired soldiers, as of those who in Syria had reuolted from Demetrius, led forth his whole army against the enemy; and after the ensignes were displayed and the onset giuen, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders soldiers that fought against it to flie; and his men pursuing them hard at heeles spoiled their campe. But the right wing in which the king himselfe was, being forced to retire, was discomfited; and as for the rest they betooke them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly slew some of his enemies; and in pursuing other some, who could not endure his fierce assault, was in the ende, by setting spurres to his horse, mainly carried into a deepe and muddie bogge, whereinto by misadventure his horse fell, and being unable to get out he was slaine in that place. For being discovered by his enemies, they turned backe vpon him; and hauing inclosed him, they they altogether shot their arrows against him, who being on foot and fighting valiantly, was at length slaine, after he had received diuers wounds, and was no more able to sustaine himselfe. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleuenth year of his reigne, as we haue declared in an other place.

Onias winneth the fauour of Ptolomey Philometor, and obtaineth leaue of him to build a temple in Aegypt, which was called the temple of Onias.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4.
Onias the son of Onias the high priest seeketh to build a temple in Egypt.

The year of the world, 3814. before Christ's natimitie, 150.

BVt Onias the sonne of the high priest called also Onias (who flying out of his countrey liued in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as wee haue heretofore declared) seeing all Iudea destroyed by the Macedonians, and their kings; and intending in his heart to purchase an immortall memorie, hee determined to beseech the king Ptolomey and the queene Cleopatra by letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a temple in Aegypt, resembling in all points that which was at Ierusalem, and that hee might haue libertie to plant Leuites and Priests in the same, of his owne kinred: And hereunto was he especially moued, by a certaine prophecy of Esay, who more then six hundred yeeres before, had foretold that a temple should be assuredly builded in Aegypt, in honour of the almightie God by a Iew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect: During the time that I was employed in your warres, and by Gods fauourable assistance haue done you many seruices, I haue visited Coelosyria and Phoenicia, and haue bene in the Citie of Leontopolis (which is in the territories of Heliopolis.) I haue also visited diuers other places, wherein the Iewes haue temples, against all right and honestie: which is the cause that they agree not among themselves: as also the like hath hapned amongst the Aegyptians, thorow the multitude of temples, and the great diuersitie of religions. And hauing found out a verie convenient place neere a Castle called Bubastis in the Plaine, where there is store of all sorts of stufte for building & cattell fit for sacrifice: I beseech you that it may be lawfull for me to purifie the temple that is leuelled in that place with the ground, & dedicated to no sacred power; & that in the place thereof it may be lawfull for me to erect & build a temple in honor of the highest God, according to the patterne and the same dimensions of that temple, which is in Ierusalem, for the preseruacion and prosperitie both of you, your Queene, and children; and to the intent that those Iewes that dwell in Aegypt may assemble and serue God therein; for that by how much the more there is vntie and concord among themselves, by so much the more may they bee disposed to your seruice. For to this effect is the prophetic of Esay, which saith thus: There shall be saith he a temple for our Lord God in Aegypt: many other things also hath he foretold as touching this place.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote vnto K. Ptolomey. And by his answer which he made herunto, a man may easily coniecture what pietie was both in him, and Cleopatra his sister, and wife. For they haue returned the sinne and transgression of the law, which through this meanes fell vpon Onias head, by this answer that ensueth. King Ptolomey and Queene Cleopatra to Onias as the high Priest, Health. Wee haue perused your letters, by which you require vs to giue you licence to cleanse the temple, that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the seigniory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubastis in the Plaine. Wee maruell very much that a temple builded in a place so vncleane and full of execrable beasts should be agreeable vnto God: but since that you informe vs, that the prophet Esay did long time sithence prophetic the same, we giue you licence, if it may be done according to the law, and with this condition, that we commit not any sin against God.

Vpon this answer, Onias (taking possession of the place) builded therein a temple, and erected an altar vnto God according to the module of the temple of Ierusalem; but farre lesse, and lesse rich. Yet thinke I it no wayes requisite to declare the dimensions thereof, neither the vessels in the same, because I describe them particularly in my seauenth booke of the warres, and captiuitie of the Iewes: neither wanted there some Leuites and Priests, who being answerable to Onias in deuotion and zeale, frequented the diuine seruice in that place, and renewed the ceremonies. But let this suffice for the present as touching the temple.

But it came to passe, that the Iewes of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the seruice and worship of the temple vpon the mount Garizim, vnder Alexander the great, fell at oddes, and debated their differents before Ptolomey. For the Iewes said that the temple in Ierusalem

OF THE IEWES. THE XIII. BOOKE

A Ialem builded according to Moses lawes and ordinances, was the lawfull temple; but the Samaritanes maintained that that which was builded on mount Garizim, was the true temple. They therefore besought the king that it would please him to sit in iudgement, with the assistance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalfe, and to condemne the partie vnto death, who should be found faultie in his proceffe. Now the aduocates which pleaded for the Samaritanes, were Sabbaus and Theodosius; and Andronicus the son of Mesalam defended the cause of Iude of Ierusalem, and the other Iewes. And both of them swore both by God and by the King, that they would bring their prooues according to the law, beseeching Ptolomey to adiudge him to death, whom he should finde to haue falsified his oath. The king therefore sate downe with his friends, both to heare the cause, and determine vpon their differents. But the Iewes of Alexandria were sore moued and displeased against them, that had drawne the preheminance of the temple in Ierusalem into question, and were highly discontent that a temple so auncient and famous, and so esteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, should in such sort bee disgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbaus and Theodosius lusted Andronicus to declaine first: who began to approoue the lawfulness, holiness, and religion of the temple in Ierusalem out of the law; and by the successiue gouernment of the high priests, who from father to sonne, and from hand to hand, had receiued this honour; therein alleading that all the kings of Asia had honoured the maiestie of that place with presents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor course of antiquitie, the temple of Garizim hath bene in any estimation. By these and such like words, Andronicus perswaded the king, that the temple of Ierusalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moses, inuiting him to adiudge Sabbaus and Theodosius to death. This may suffice as touching the differents of the Iewes of Alexandria, and such things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

CHAP. VII.

Alexander after Demetrius death honoured Ionathan greatly.

After that Demetrius was slaine in fight (according as wee haue heretofore declared) Alexander was king of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter answerable to his dignitie, to contract affinity with him; first since he had obtained his fathers empire by the fauour of God: and next for that he had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing care to these his demands, and entertaining them with great pleasure, wrote backe that hee was verie glad that he had recovered his fathers kingdome; promising him to giue him his daughter in marriage; giuing him to vnderstand, that he would meet him at Ptolemais, and bring his daughter vnto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After hee had written these letters, Ptolomey made his speedie repaire to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he deliuered him his daughter, with such a dowrie of gold and siluer, as well beleemed his kingly magnificence. Vnto the solemnizing of this marriage, Alexander by letters inuited the high Priest Ionathan, commanding him to repaire vnto him to Ptolemais. Where, after he was arrived, and had both presented his seruice with other magnificent presents to both the kings; hee was highly honoured by both, in so much as Alexander constrained him to put off his ordinarie garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to sit vpon a royall throne; commaunding his captaines to march before him thorow the Citie; and to commaund by publike edict, that no man should dare to speake any thing against him; neither offer him any cause of discontent in what sort soeuer. All which the captaines performed; so that they, who purposely and maliciously repaired thither to accuse him, seeing the honour that was done vnto him by this publication, fled away hastily, for feare lest some mishap should befall the. This king Alexander loued Ionathan so intirely, that he afforded him the chiefest place amongst the number of his dearest friends.

Demetrius the sonne of Demetrius passeth out of Greece into Cilicia & seeketh to make himselfe Lord of Syria.

A man confident in battell.

Apollonius fighteth with Ionathan, and is put to flight.

Ionathan pursued the enemy as farre as Azot, and burned Dagon temple, and killed 8000. men.

IN the hundreth, sixtie and fift yeere (of the raigne of the Greekes) Demetrius the sonne of Demetrius (accompanied with diuers hired soldiers, whom Lasthenes Candiot furnished him with) depart out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which newes as soone as Alexander heard, he was grieuously vexed & troubled: for which cause he instantly possessed from Phoenicia to Antioch, with intent to assure the affaires of his kingdome in that place before the arrivall of Demetrius. Hee left behind him for his gouernor in Coelosyria Apollonius Danus: who comming vnto Iamnia with a great army, sent a messenger vnto the high priest Ionathan, signifying vnto him that it was not conuenient that hee onely should liue in assurance at his own ease: & in authoritie, without submitting himselfe vnto a King; and that it was a great indignitie for him in all mens eyes, for that he had not inforced himselfe to stoupe vnder the obedience of a king. For which cause (said he) deceiue not thy self, neither hope thou by skulking in the most raines, or depending on thy forces to continue thy greatnes; but if thou trustest to thy power, come down into the field, & encounter with me & my army in the Plain, to the end that the issue of the victorie may shew which of vs is most valiant. Be not thou so ignorant that the noblest of euerie Citie beare armes vnder one, who haue alwaies ouercome thy predecessors. For which cause I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may vse our swords and no stones; and where the vanquished shal haue no aduantage by his flight. Ionathan whetted by this bitter message, chose out ten thousand of his best souldiers, and departed from Ierusalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came vnto Ioppe, and encamped without the Citie (because the Citizens had shut the gates against him) for they had a garrison planted in that place by Apollonius. But as soone as hee addressed himselfe to batter the Citie, the inhabitants were afraide, for feare least hee should surpris the same by force, and for that cause they opened him the gates. Apollonius understanding that Ioppe was taken by Ionathan, hee tooke three thousand horsemen, and eight thousand footmen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his army with a sober march, foot by foot; & arriuing at Ioppe, he retired backe to draw Ionathan into the field, assuring himselfe vpon his horsemen, & grounding his hope of victorie vpon them. But Ionathan issuing out boldly, pursued Apollonius as farre as Azot: who finding himselfe in the champain field, turned backe vpon him and charged him. Ionathan was in no sort abashed to see the thousand horsemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambush neere vnto a certaine streame, to the end they might charge the Iewes behind, but disposed his armie in such sort, that his souldiers on euerie side turned their faces vpon the enemy; commanding his men to defend themselves on both sides, fighting with those that assailed them either in the vanguard or the rereward. This battell continued vntill euening, and Ionathan had given his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to set vpon the enemies battell: as for himselfe, he drew himselfe and his souldiers into a forme of a battalion resembling a Tortoise, to the end that being couered with their bucklers, ioyned the one with the other, they might beare off the horsemens arrowes: to which all of them shewed themselves obedient. The enemies horsemen shooting all their arrowes against them, did them no harme; for they pierced not as farre as the flesh, but lighting vpon the bucklers (enclosed and fastned the one within the other) they were easily beaten backe & borne off, and fell downe being shot all in vaine. But when as the enemies were wearied with shooting from betimes in the morning vntill euening, & that Simon perceiued they could charge no further, he set vpon them with his souldiers to couragiously, that he put them all to flight. The horsemen of Apollonius perceiuing that the footemen were dilarraid, grew hartles likewise, & wearied also for that they had fought vntill the euening; and hauing lost the hope that they had in the footmen, they tooke their flight in great disorder, and confusion: so that they brake their ranks of themselves, and were scattered thorow all the Plaine. Ionathan also pursued them as farre as Azot, and taking the Citie by assault, he slue diuers of them, conftraining the rest that were in despair to flee into the temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the Citie by assault, hee burned it with the villages round about, and spared not the temple of Dagon, but burned it and all those that were therein. The number as well of those that were slaine in the battell, as of those that were consumed by fire in the temple, was eight thousand men. Hauing therefore in this sort discomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched towards Ascalon: and as he was encamped without the Citie, the Ascalonites came out vnto him, and both presented and honoured Ptolomey Philometor repaireth into Syria with an army to fight his son in law Alexander. Ionathan meeteth with Ptolomey, & is honorably entertained by him.

Treason intended against Ptolomey, and discovered for which cause hee taketh away his daughter from Alexander, and giueth her to Demetrius for his wife.

A red him. He willingly entertaining their good affection, departed from thence, and iourned towards Ierusalem charged with great spoiles, which after his victorie against his enemy, he draue before him after he had spoiled the country.

As soone as Alexander heard that Apollonius the generall of his army was discomfited, and forced to flee, he made a shew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was against his wil that Ionathan had beene molested by warre, who was both his friend and ally. Whereupon he sent an Embassadour vnto him, to signifie vnto him how much hee reioiced at his victorie, offering him presents and honours, with a chaine of golde, such as the kings were accustomed to giue to those of their kinred: he likewise gaue him Ascaron and the countrey thereunto belonging, to him and his heires for euer.

B About the same time king Ptolomey Philometor set out an army by sea, and another by land, to repaire into Syria, and to succour his sonne in law Alexander: and in his way all the Cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commaunded them, and conducted him as farre as the City of Azot: in which place all of them exclaimed before him, and chalenged Iustice at his hand, for that the temple of Dagon was burned and destroyed; accusing Ionathan for the firing thereof, and the slaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing these accusations, answered them not a word: But when Ionathan came for to meete him at Ioppe, he courted him with royall presents, and all the honour that was possible, and after hee had kept him company as farre as the floud called Eleutherus he dismissed him, and sent him backe to Ierusalem. When Ptolomey was come to Prolcmais, he hardly escaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexanders owne complouring, and Ammonius his friends mediation: Which treachery being discovered, Ptolomey wrote vnto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might bee punished for his treasons and conspiracies practiced against him, which in their natures required a seuer & cruell punishment. But seeing that Alexander deliuered him not vp into his hands, he coniectured and concluded, that he himselfe was the author thereof, & conceived a hainous displeasure against him. In like manner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the means of the said Ammonius, who had laden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the ende Ammonius was punished for these his outrageous misdemeanors, and disgracefully slaine like a woman, whilest in a womans attire, he sought to hide himselfe; as we haue expressed in another place.

D At that time Ptolomey began to aduise himselfe for bestowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refusing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: so that he brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawn his daughter from him, hee presently sent Embassadours vnto Demetrius to confirme a league of peace and affinity with him; promising him to bestowe his daughter vpon him in marriage, and to establish him in his fathers kingdome. Demetrius very ioyfull to heare of this Embassage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There onely remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to surmount, which was how he might perswade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, against whom they were so grieuously incensed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty ouercame he by this means that ensueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, because of Ammonius (as we haue expressed heretofore) and by that means were the more easily drawn to driue him out of the Citie. Hee perceiuing himselfe to bee thrust out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came vnto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and souldiers therein, proclaimed king, and was constrained to take two Diademes, the one as King of Asia, the other as king of Aegypt. He was a man of a gentle and iust nature, no waies ambitious; but such a one as prudently did forecast what was to ensue: straining by all meanes possible to auoid the hatred and ialousie of the Romans. For which cause (assembling the Antiochians together) he wrought so much with them, that at last hee perswaded them to accept of Demetrius, assuring them that if he should receiue that benefite at their hands, he would no more keepe in memory those things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father: protesting for his own part that he would instruct him both how to order the course of his life honestly, & to manage his publike affairs rightly; and promising them that if he attempted to work them any inconuenient, he himselfe would be the formost to chastice him; alleaging for his own part, that he would content himselfe to be king of Aegypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receiue Demetrius.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great armie, and was come into Syria, and had burned and spoyled the countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanied with his sonne Demetrius (for hee had already married his daughter vnto him) issued out with their armies, and obtained a ioint and mutuall victorie, by ouercomming Alexander, who was constrained to flie into Arabia. It came to passe in that conflict, that Ptolomeis horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled and stumbled in such sort, as he threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceiued, they ran altogether vpon him, and gaue him diuers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to haue been slaine, vnlesse his guard had rescued him: notwithstanding he was so sicke for foure daies space, that he could neither heare nor speake. But Zabel the potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head vnto Ptolomey; who being somewhat come vnto himselfe after his wounds on the fifth day, and hauing some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightfull in his eare, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemy. But some few daies after, he dyed himselfe, being full of ioy in that he saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamaced Balles, reigned for the space of fife yeers, as we haue elsewhere declared.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor, hauing obtained the kingdome, began thorow his malice to dismember Ptolomeis army, forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomeis daughter. But the men of warre hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselves from his wickednesse; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the high Priest Jonathan hauing assembled an army of all the countrey of Iudæa, began to besiege the castle of Ierusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Iewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Jonathan had raised to surprise the place; in the strength whereof they repelled too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came vnto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased thereat, & taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make warre vpon Jonathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, he wrote to Jonathan and commanded him to come vnto him: notwithstanding Jonathan gaue not ouer the siege, but tooke the Elders and the Priests with him, with gold and siluer, robes, and a great quantity of presents to beare vnto Demetrius, and when he had deliuered them into his hands he appeased his wrath; and after he had receiued many honors at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his priesthood, in as ample manner, as hee enioied it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Iewes accused him, yet did not Demetrius giue them any credit. Moreouer, Jonathan requiring, that for the whole countrey of Iewry, and for the three gouernments of Samaria, Ioppe, and Galilee, hee might pay no more then three hundred talents for tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrot his letters patents in these tearms: King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Iews: Peace and Ioy. We haue sent you the copy of the letter, that we haue written to Lasthenes our father, to the end you may know the contents thereof, which is this. King Demetrius to Lasthenes his father: Ioy and Peace. Because the people of the Iewes are our confederats, and obiect our ordinances, my intent is to requite their good affection, & to assigne them the three gouernments of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which haue been taken from Samaria and annexed to Iudæa. Secondly, we remit all that which our predecessors kings receiued of them that sacrificed in Ierusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered for the fruits of the earth & the trees; the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was leuiued for the crowne: so that henceforward nothing herof be exacted at their hands, either for the time present or to come. See you therefore giue order that the Copy of these our present letters be sent and deliuered to Jonathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred temple. See here what hee wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiuing that his countrey was in peace, and that hee liued without feare of any warre, he dismissed his army, & cashiered his souldiers, hiring only certaine strangers (who were mustred out of Candy and other Isles) whereby it came to passe that his owne souldiers conceived an enuy and hatred against him; in chat hee gaue them no wages: whereas his predecessors maintained them as well in peace as in warre, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards them; and that if need required to employ them, they might shew themselves more ready and couragious to fight for them.

CHAP. IX.

Tryphon Apamenus ouercommeth Demetrius, and giueth the kingdom to Antiochus the son of Alexander, and plightheth friendship with Jonathan.

Certaine man called Diodotus, and by surname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation and generall of Alexanders army) hearing what mutiny there was amongst Demetrius souldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing vp of Antiochus Alexanders sonne, and wrought as much as in him lay that he would commit Antiochus to his trust, to the intent he might make him king, and establish him in the soueraigne gouernment which appertained to his father. And although vpon this first motiõ of his, he could hardly be drawn to beleue it; yet not long after by the continual instance of Tryphon he was perswaded to condescend, and suffered himself to be drawne by his perswasions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the high Priest, desiring that they within the citadel of Ierusalem and those wicked and Apostate Iewes, and in generall all those that were in the garrisons thorowout all the countrey, might be displaced and dismissed; he sent Embassadors with rich presents vnto Demetrius, beseeching him to cashier those that were in garrison in the fortresses of Iudæa: who nor onely promised him that demaund, but also matters of far greater moment, after that warre which hee had then in hand, were determined. For the present troubles at that time, gaue him no leisure to performe the same: he therefore praid him for the right of their friendship to send him some of his forces, giuing him to vnderstand, that his army was revolted. Whereupon Jonathan chose out three thousand fighting men, and sent them vnto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both because of the injuries they had endured vnder him, as also for the hatred they had conceived against his father, who had in like manner done them much wrong; so that they onely expected and watched their opportunity, to expulse him. Vnderstanding therefore that the succours that Jonathan sent vnto Demetrius were at hand; & foreseeing that in short time hee would gather a great army, if they hastened not themselves to preuent him betime; they betook them to their weapons, and beset the kings palace after the manner of a siege, and guarded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the king. Who seeing himselfe roundly beset by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, tooke those hired souldiers (with those whom Jonathan had sent him) and charged them: but hee was forced to retire, and ouercome by them, who were assembled in that place to the number of manie thousands. For which cause the Iewes perceiuing that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted vpon the battlements of the palace, and from thence darted and shot against them, without any endamage to themselves (by reason of the distance and height of the place where they were) notwithstanding they gauled the people grieuouly, in so much as they drove them from the houses nere adioining, which they continually set on fire, whereby the flame thereof was spread thorow the whole Citie; so that the houses that were closely builded the one by the other, and for the most part framed of wood, were burnt downe to the ground. The Antiochians perceiuing that they could not remedy the fire, nor extinguish the same, betook them to flight, and the Iews chasing them from house to house, pursued them after an incredible manner. When the king perceived that the Citizens of Antioch ranne here and there to saue their wiues, and children, and for that occasion had giuen out the battel, he set vpon them in a certaine narrow streight, whereas diuers of them were slain, and all at last enforced to cast downe their weapons, and to yeeld themselves to Demetrius mercie, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that sedition. After this he rewarded the Iewes with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authours of his victorie. Whereupon hee sent them backe to Jonathan, with no small acknowledgement and testimony of their prowess & virtue. But afterwards he discovered his euil nature towards him, and falsified his promises, menacing him to make warre vpon him except hee paid him those tributes, which the people of the Iewes ought, and were wont to pay vnto the kings his auncestors before time. And these designs of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindered him: for hee was enforced to turne his forces that he had prepared against Jonathan, to make warre vpon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus (who at that time was under yeeres) he set the diadem vpon his head. All the army likewise that had abandoned Demetrius, for thoring them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open warre against their master, and vnder Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him and ouercame him, seizing both his Elephants, and the Citie of Antioch. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly discomfited, fled into Cilicia. But the younger Antiochus sent Embassadors and letters to Jonathan, calling him his ally and friend, confirming the priesthood vnto him, and allotted him the foure governments annexed to Iudæa; and besides these, he gaue him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to wear the same; he gaue him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon Generall of his army, from the marches of Tyre as farre as Aegypt. Jonathan highly reioiced at these fauours of Antiochus, and sent Embassadors both vnto him and Tryphon, protesting that he was their friend and ally, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefites which he had receiued (notwithstanding that in his necessity he had been succoured by him) returned him euil for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leaue to leuy a great army out of Syria & Phœnicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himselfe incontinently into the Cities, who receiued him very magnificently; yet did they not afford him any men of war. Comming from thence vnto Aſcalon, the Citizens in honourable array came out to meete him with presents; whom, together with the Cities of Coelosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, & to follow Antiochus; to the end, that ioining themselves with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefs which they had oftentimes endured by his means; and which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to procure their reuenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But hee found the Gazcans to be of a farre contrary disposition, then that which he expected; for they flatly refused him; and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius; yet would they not ioin their forces, or submit their Citie to his government. For which cause Jonathan besieged their Citie, and spoiled their country: for with the one halfe of his army he begirt Gaza; and with the other halfe he ouerranne the countrey, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazcans seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiving that no succours came vnto them from Demetrius; but that their own overthrow was at hand, & their assistance farre off; and that which was worse, most vncertaine: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers vnto Jonathan, protesting that they would bee both his friends and confederates. For, men doe vnwillingly take knowledge of their profite, before they haue bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was most expedient for them to performe before they were afflicted, that doe they earnestly hunt after, at such time as they haue been chastised. Vpon this submission of theirs, Jonathan receiued them into fauour, and took pledges of them, & sent them to Ierusalem; and from thence marched hee along the countrey as farre as Damaſco. And whereas a huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as farre as the Citie Cedſa neere vnto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to diuert Jonathan from Syria, by succouring and relieuing those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Jonathan went out speedily to meete with them recommending the estate of Iudæa to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to be gathered thoroughout all the countrey, encamped before Bethſura, a strong fort in Iudæa; and besieged it (for Demetrius being before time seized thereof, kept garrison therein, as before this we haue declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarkes and fitted his engines to assault the Citie, and employed all his study to surpris the same, they that were besieged waxed afraid, least if he should take the towne by force, they should lose their liues. For which cause, they sent an herald vnto Simon, requesting him that hee would permit them to depart out of Bethſura with the safety of their liues and goods, and go vnto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the Citie, and he planted a garrison therin of his own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the meane while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, caused his army to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where first he was encamped, & marched towards the plaine of Azot, without any suspition that his enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Jonathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed neere the mountain, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battell in the Plaine. As soone as Jonathan perceiued their preparation to the battell, hee arranged his army as conueniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Iewes vpon their backs, they fearing to be inclosed, and consequently easily slaine, began to flie; so that all of them abandoned ned Jonathan except som few to the number of fifty at the vttermoſt, & Matthias the son of Abſalom and Judas the sonne of Chapſeus, the chieftains of the army, who boldly entred, and like desperate men charged the enemy in the vangard with such fury, that they made them amazed at their valour, & by force of handy blowes compelled them to trust to their heels. Which when they that fled from Jonathan perceiued, they rallied themselves and began to pursue them as far as Cedſa, where the enemies were encamped.

Now when Jonathan had obtained this famous victorie, wherein there dyed about some two thousand of the enemy, he returned to Ierusalem, and seeing that by Gods providence all things fell out according as he himselfe desired, hee sent Embassadors vnto Rome, purposely to renewe the auncient league that was made betwixt them, and the people of the Iewes: commending his Embassadors vpon their returne from Rome, to transport themselves to Sparta, and renewe their common friendship and acquaintance also in that place. As soone as they were come to Rome, and had presented themselves before the Senate, they declared how they were sent from the high Priest Jonathan, who required the renouation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amity of the Iewes, and gaue them their letters of recommendation to beare vnto all the Kings of Asia and Europe, and to the gouernours of all the Cities; commanding them to grant them free passage to returne into their countrey. And in their returne they passed by the Lacedemonians, and presented those letters which Jonathan had written vnto them, the copy whereof contained matters to this effect. Jonathan the high Priest of the Nation of the Iewes, and all the communalitie of the Iewes; To the

Ephores, Senate and people of Sparta: Health. If you be in health, and both your particular and publicke affaires haue their desired successe, we haue that which we desire: For our selues we are in good disposition. For as much as heretofore we haue receiued a letter by the hands of Demoteles, written from Arius your king to Onias our high Priest, making mention of that acquaintance and alliance, which is betwene you and vs (the copy whereof we haue hereunder inserted) and haue receiued your letters with great content, and haue with all kindly acceptance requited both Demoteles and Arius (notwithstanding we were not ignorant of this consanguinity long before, for that we were instructed therein by our sacred scriptures:) And whereas we haue not first of all acknowledged you for our kinsmen, it was to no other end but for feare we should rashly the honour of ratifying the friendship betwene vs, which wee intended alwaies should be D yours. Since which time wherein we haue contracted friendship with you, we haue on our holy and Iſtemne daies sacrificed vnto our God, beseeching him to continue & keep you in prosperity: & on the other side, in as much as we haue bin inuironed with many wars, caused by the disordered desires of our neighbours, we haue neither thought it meet to be troublesome vnto you, or to any other whatſoeuer. But now at this time, since we haue obtained a happy issue of all these troubles, we haue sent Numenius the sonne of Antimachus, and Antipater the sonne of Iafon, men honourable amongst our counsellors, both to the Romans and to you also; to whom wee haue giuen our letters to be presented vnto you, in our behalfe, to the end they might renewe the amity which is betwene you & vs: you shall therefore do well if you write backe vnto vs, and certify vs wherein we may steed you, in that we haue euer had an earnest desire, and will to continue our loue towards you, or ought else what concerneth your welfare. These Embassadors of his were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publik ordinance as touching their association, and amity with the Iewes; which they deliuered vnto them.

In this time were there three sects among the Iewes, who had different and contrary opinions as touching humane affaires: the first was that of the Pharisees, the second of the Sadduces; and the third of the Essenians. The Pharisees affirme that some things and not all things, are directed by destiny; and that some other things were tyed to mens election, whether they would performe them or not. The Essenians said, that destiny governed all things; and that nothing hapned amongst men that was not disposed thereby. The Sadduces auow that there is no destiny; and that humane affaires, in that destiny is not, cannot be gouerned and disposed thereby: F their onely opinion is, that all things depend vpon our owne disposition; so as in respect of our good deedes, we are the authors thereof; and in respect of our euill, they are the fruites of our irregard. But hercof haue I intreated more exactly in my second booke of the warres of the Iewes.

Demetrius Capitaines desirous to abolish the dishonour of that discomfiture, and recouer the losse that had lately befallen them, gathered together a greater povver then the former, & went out against Jonathan; vvhoe hauing intelligence of their coming, marched speedily to encounter them them neere vnto the Plaine of Amath: for he resolved to preuent their intended roade into Iudæa. Encamping therefore some fifty furlongs off of the enemy, hee sent out spies to discover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view knowe all that possibly they could, returning tooke certaine prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the entent of the enemies was discovered vnto Jonathan; which was, that they would set vpon them on the suddaine. But Jonathan with a provident care speedily fortified his campe, and prepared all things necessary for defence, and placed a watch or Sentinell without his host, keeping his souldiers vp in armes all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and ready, forasmuch as they must needs fight by night, to the end that they might not be surpris'd by the subtilties and policies of their enemies. But when the Captaines of Demetrius understood that their intended purpose was discovered vnto Jonathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsaile to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practice of subtil meanes to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselves not to be of sufficient strength to bid Jonathan battell in the plaine field; they therefore resolved to flie, and leaue great fires through all their campe, to the end their enemies might thinke they were asleepe: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Jonathan drew neere their campe to bid them battell, and saw it abandoned, and coniectured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but he could not overtake them, because they had already past the floud Eleutherus, & were retired into their strong holds and places of security. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making warre on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their country, tooke great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco, and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon his brother (marching thorow out all Iudæa & Palestine as farre as Ascalon; planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition: and finally came to Ioppe, which he tooke by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because he was aduertised that they of Ioppe intended to surrender the Citie to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Jonathan had in this sort disposed all things, they came to Ierusalem, and assembled the people together in the temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walles of the City, and to strengthen the inclosure of the temple that was ruinated, aduising them to fortify the same with strong towers: & besides this, he caused another wall to be builded in the midst of the Citie, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that meanes they might cut off and stop vp the passages to victuall the fort. Hee aduised them likewise, to build farre stronger fortresses thorow out the country, then those that were already finished. Now whenas the people had allowed of this his good aduice, Jonathan gaue order as touching all those things that concerned the buildings within the City, and set his brother Simon about the fortresses in the country. But Demetrius passing the riuer, came into Mesopotamia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the Citie of Babylon; that being seized thereof, he might the better prouide for all the occurrences of his kingdom. For the Greeks & Macedonians, who inhabited that countrey, had solicited him by often Embassadors to come vnto them, promising him to subscribe to his authority, and to warre with him against Asaces King of the Parthians. He puffed vp with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resolving with himselfe, that after he had overcome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage warre with Tryphon, and easily drine him out of the kingdome of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the country with great affection, he leuied a great army, and assailed Asaces; but he lost the day, and himselfe was taken prisoner, as we haue elsewhere declared.

CHAP. X.

Demetrius is taken prisoner. Tryphon breaketh the covenant of peace betwixt him and Jonathan, and surpriseth and killeth him treacherously, and afterwards maketh warre against his brother Simon.

When Tryphon vnderstood that Demetrius affaires had so vnfortunate an issue, he forsook Antiochus and his seruice; and complotted with himselfe how hee might kill him and make himselfe king. But the feare that he had of Jonathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolved first of all to deliuer himselfe of Jonathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young king away. Having therefore concluded with him

himselfe to kill Jonathan by some stratagem of treason, he came from Antioch to Bethsan (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meete him with forty thousand chosen men, supposing that Tryphon resorted thither to make warre vpon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with so much strength, wrought him by presents and counterfeit curtelies; commanding his captaines to obey Jonathan, thinking by that meanes to perfwade him that hee intirely and truely loued him, and to extinguish his suspition, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at such time as he had least suspition of him. He counsell'd him to dismisle his army likewise, because hauing cut off all occasion of warre, he had no reason to retaine them, for that there was no suspition of alteration. After this he inuited Jonathan to come to Ptolemais, and to bring with him some few of his souldiers, signifying vnto him that he would deliuer the Citie into his hands, and resign all the fortresses that were in the country to his possession; vrging further, that he came into that country to no other end, but to performe it. Jonathan suspecting no sinister dealing, and beleeuing that Tryphon spake of good and entire affection, discharged his forces, and tooke onely three thousand men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, & with one thousand repaired to Ptolemais vnto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans shutting the gates as soone as he was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) tooke Jonathan prisoner, and slewe all those that attended vpon him. He presently sent also part of his army vnto the two thousand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the sword: but they hauing notice of that which had befallen their chieftaine, taking vp their arms, speedily departed out of Galilee. And although the souldiers of Tryphon exceeded them farre in number, yet were they not so hardy as to trie whether part were the stronger; because they knew that the Iewes were ready to expose themselves to all dangers, to defend their liues: and so they returned back to him that sent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The people maketh Simon generall of their army, and declareth him the high Priest.

They of Ierusalem vnderstanding of the surprisall of Jonathan, and the losse of his souldiers, grievously lamented for this accident, that so great a man as he was, was taken from them, in that they feared (& that not without cause) that being destitute after his decesse both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them would seek their trouble and molestation: who hauing held themselves quiet in admiration of him, would at that time list themselves vp against them; and not only persecute them with warre, but bring them into extreame danger of their liues. Neither did their expectation deceiue them. For the neighbouring nations, vnderstanding of Jonathan's death, began presently to make warre vpon the Iewes on all sides, as against those who had no longer any chieftaine vnder whose conduct they might wage warre and shew themselves valiant. And Tryphon likewise hauing gathered forces, was determined to ascend into Iudæa, to warre against the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiuing that the Citizens of Ierusalem were dismayed with the feare, which they apprehended of those rumours intended by Tryphon; assembled the people in the temple, and began to exhort them after this manner. You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, haue voluntarily offered our selues vnto death for your libertie. Since therefore, I haue abundance of such like examples, and that it is the ordinary course of our family to die for our lawe and religion, there is no feare so great as can plucke out this resolution out of my heart, as it may plant such a desire of life in me, as to be drawne to forget all honour. Wherefore since you haue such a chieftaine and commander, as setteth light by all danger, whereby he may endure or doe any thing for your safety; it behooueth you to follow me courageously to what place soeuer I shall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, whereby I should spare my life; neither am I lesse then they, whereby I should thorow negligence and cowardise shun and forsake that which they haue esteemed to be honorable, as is to die for the law and the seruice of our God. I will make manifest therefore by all the testimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawfull brother; for I trust in God, that he will giue me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliuer not onely all of you, but your wiues and your children from the iniurie which they intend against you; and by the grace of God I will preserve the holy temple, that it may not be ruined by their prophane hands. For, I already perceiue, that the prophane nations set vs at nought, nought, and contemne you as if you had no chieftaine: and I know already that they are marching forward to fight with you. By these words Simon harmed the people, who were distracted with feare, so that they reuiued their spirits and conceiued better hope. Whereupon all of them cried out with a loude voice, that Simon was their generall, and that he was to succeed his two valiant brethren Iudas and Jonathan in the government; and that as touching themselves, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. He therefore assembled in one instant all the men at armes in that country, and hasted himselfe to repaire the City walls, defending them with high and strong towers, and sent a certain friend of his called Jonathan the son of Abisalom, with an army to Ioppe; commanding him to expulse the inhabitants of that City from thence, for that he feared lest they should submit themselves to Tryphon: As for himselfe he remained in Ierusalem to secure the same.

Tryphon departing from Ptolemais with a great army, came into Iudæa; leading his prisoner Jonathan with him. Whereupon Simon with his army went out against him as farre as Addida (a Citie situate vpon a mountaine, as the foote whereof beginneth the champain country of Iudæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made gouernour of the Iewes, sent messengers vnto him, intending to circumuent him by treason and policie; giuing him to vnderstand that if hee were desirous of his brothers enlargement, he should send him one hundredth talents of siluer, & two of Jonathan's children for hostages, to assure him, that being set at liberty, he should not withdraw Iudæa from the obedience of the king.) For, till that present he was helde and kept prisoner, by reason of the money which he ought the king.) Simon was no waies ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphon, but knew wel enough that he should both lose his money, if he should deliuer the same; and that his brother should not be enlarged, no though his children were deliuered for hostages: on the other side he feared, lest the people should conceiue sinisterly of him, as if he had been the cause of his brothers death, both by not deliuering the money, neither yet the children: Hauing therefore assembled the army, he declared vnto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole scope of his actions were nought els but traitorous stratagemes and subtilities: yet notwithstanding he tolde them, that he had rather send both the money & the children to Tryphon, then by refusing his conditions and demands, to be accused to haue neglected the life of his brother. Simon therefore sent both the money and children of Jonathan: but Tryphon hauing receiued both, kept not his promise; but detained Jonathan: and leading his armie thorow the country, intended to passe by Idumæa to repaire to Ierusalem. He came therefore to K Dora a Citie in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping alwaies right ouer against him. They that were in the Castle of Ierusalem, hearing newes hereof, sent Tryphon word that hee should hasten and come vnto them, and send them munition: whereupon he addressed his horsemen, pretending that very night to ride vnto Ierusalem; but the snow about that time fell in such abundance, that it covered the way in such sort and was so thicke, as the horses could not trauell; which hindred his repaire to Ierusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Coelosyria; and speedily inuading the country of Galilad, he put Jonathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon sent vnto Basca and transported his brothers bones, and interred them in his country Modin in his fathers sepulcher, and all the people mourned and lamented for him many daies. Simon also builded a great monument of white and polished marble for his father and his brethren, and raised it to a great height, and garnished it round about with galleries & pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable work to beholde. Besides that, he erected seuen Pyramides for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, so great and so faire, as they moued admiration in those that behelde them; and are as yet to be seene at this present day. So great was Simons care, that Jonathan and the rest of his family should be honoured with so magnificent a sepulcher: which Jonathan died, after he had exercised the place of high priest, and possessed the government for foure yeeres. Thus much as touching his death.

As soone as Simon had taken possession of the high Priesthood, by the election of the people; the very first yeere of his government, hee acquitted the people of the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This liberty and exemption from tribute hapned amongst the Iewes, one hundredth and seuentie yeeres since the time that Seleucus surnamed Nicanor obtayned the kingdom of Syria. And in so great honour was Simon amongst the people, that in their priuate contracts and publike letters, the date began from the first yeere of Simon the benefactor and gouernour of the Iewish nation. For they prospered greatly vnder his gouernment, and had the victory of all their neighbouring enemies round about them. For he destroyed the Cities

A Cities of Gaza, Ioppe, and Iamnia: he raised also the citadell of Ierusalem, and leuelled it with the ground, to the intent the enemies might be neuer seized thereof any more, nor retreat themselves thither to endamage the City, as before time they had done. Which when he had brought to passe, he thought it not amisse, but very profitable, to leuell the hill whereon the Castle stood, to the intent the temple might be the eminentest place. All this perswaded he the people to do in a common assembly, laying before their eyes how many euills they had suffered, by the means of the garrisons, and how much they were like to suffer hereafter, if a stranger should once more be master of the kingdom, and build a citadell in that place. By these exhortations he perswaded the people to finish these works, and all of them began to trauel without intermission both day & night, so that in the space of 3. yeeres they plained the mountain, and wrought it downe; and from that time forward there was nothing but the temple that commanded the City. See here what Simon performed hitherto.

CHAP. XII.

Simon besiegeth Tryphon within Dora, and contracteth alliance with Antiochus, surnamed the Deuout.

Not long after the captiuitie of Demetrius, Tryphon slew Alexander the son of Antiochus surnamed God, notwithstanding he had the care and charge of his education for foure yeeres, during which time he raigned; and spreading abroad a certaine noise and rumour, that the young king in exercising himselfe fortuned to die, he sent his friends and familiars vnto the men of war, promising them that if they would elect and choole him King, he would giue them a huge sum of money; giuing them to vnderstand, that Demetrius was prisoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother should obtaine the kingdom, he would punish them diuers waies, and reuenge their reuolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forsaking him. The army hoping, that if they bestowed the kingdom on Tryphon, it would rebound highly to their profit, they proclaimed him king. But after he had attained the fulnesse of his desires, hee shewed how malicious and wicked his nature was. For at such time as he was a priuate man, he flattered the people and made shew of moderation; and by such allurements he drew them to do what him listed: but after he had taken possession of the kingdom, he discovered his hypocrisie, and shewed plainly that he was not vnaptly called Tryphon, that is to say, a trifier or mocker. By which meanes he drew the hearts of the better sort from him: and as for his army, they grew so much in hatred of him, that they submitted themselves to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time shut vp both her selfe and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus, surnamed the Deuout, and brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any City that would entertaine him for feare of Tryphon; Cleopatra sent vnto him, inuiting him both to be her husband, and to take the possession of the kingdom. And hereunto did the rather draw him, partly for that she was thereunto perswaded by her friends, and partly for the feare shee had, lest some one of Seleucia should betray the Citie to Tryphon. As soon as Antiochus was arrived in Seleucia, and that from day to day his forces increased, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and ouercame him in battell, and droue him out of the higher Syria, and pursued him as farre as Phoenicia: where after hee had retired himselfe into Dora, a strong and impregnable Castle, he besieged him therein, and sent present Embassadors to Simon the high Priest of the Iewes, to confirme a friendship and confederacy with him. Simon very curteously accepted his demands, and presently sent Antiochus both money and victuals, sufficient to furnish his army at the siege of Dora, so that in short space hee was accepted amongst the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place besieged, taken and slaine, after he had raigned three yeeres.

CHAP. XIII.

F After Tryphons death, Simon made warre against Antiochus, and droue Cendebeus out of Iudæa.

But the innated avarice that was in Antiochus, and the malignitie of his nature made him forgetfull of those offices and seruices that Simon had done him: so that he sent Cendebeus his great friend with a mighty army to inuade Iewry, and to surpris Simon. But hee hauing some priuie intelligence of Antiochus treacherie, notwithstanding that at this time hee was very olde, was in such sort moued with the iniuries that Antiochus had done him, as animated with courage more then became his age, he went himsele to the warre; as if as yet hee had beene but youthfull: he therefore caused his sonne to march before with the picked souldiers of his army; and hauing left a number of his souldiers in ambush, in the hollow retreats of the mountains, he executed all his designs without failing in any one of them: so that after he had euery way obtained the vpper hand of his enemies, he euer after enioied his gouernment in peace, during the remainder of his life, and renewed likewise the confederacy with the Romans.

HE gouerned Iudæa for the space of eight ycares, and was at length slaine at a banquet by the trechery of Ptolomey his sonne in law; who being seized of Simons wife and his two children, and detaining them in prison, sent out certaine of his traine besides, to kill John the third sonne surnamed Hircanus. But the young man hauing some inkling of their drift, retired himsele speedily into the City, and auoided the daunger that they complotted against him; assuring himsele of the good will of the people, in consideration of the benefites they had receiued at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare vnto Ptolomey; who intending to enter the City gates was sharply repulged by the Citizens, for that they had already entertained Hircanus.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 14. Ptolomey besieged by Hircanus knowing the power of nature: affliction keepeth his mother and brethren prisoners in the walls, & threatneth to throwe them downe.

WHERVpon Ptolomey retyred vnto a certaine Castle, situate beyond Iericho called Dagon: but Hircanus was made high Priest in his fathers stead: who after hee had recommended himselfe to God by the firstling sacrifices that he offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make war vpon him. Now when he was fully addrested to besiege the place which Ptolomey was retired, he had the aduantage in all other things; but only by the affection that he bare vnto his mother and his brethren, hee was overcome. For Ptolomey hauing taken them, and whipt them vpon the walles in all mens presence, threatned Hircanus that vnlesse he leuied his siege, he would cast them downe headlong from the toppes of the Castle: now where as one way Hircanus had a great desire to enforce and surprise the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, thorow the desire that he had to redeme those, whom hee loved, from the enemies tyranny. True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake hee should not giue ouer valiantly to assault the place; but that hee should bee the more encouraged to surprise the fortresse, and to lay hold vpon his enemy. & be reuenged on the wrong that was offered vnto his dearest friends: alleaging that hee thought it better to die in the midst of a thousand torments, then that the enemy should escape unpunished, who had beene so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hircanus heard his mother speake thus, he was more furiously incensed to giue the assault: but as soone as hee saw his mother so beaten and so sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and that feruent desire which hee before had to batter and beate downe the Citie, was presently alayd and cooled; and so the pitifull compassion on his mother, surmounted and overcame his irefull affection of reuenge. Whilst thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the year of repose celebrated among the Iewes was come: For they obserued the seauenth year, as the seauenth day is obserued in the weeke; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was deliuered of this siege, who afterwards slue both Hircanus mother & brethren: which done he fled vnto Zeno surnamed Coryla, who at that time tyrannized in the citie of the Philadelphians.

CHAP. XVI.

Antiochus the Deuout maketh warre against Hircanus, and vpon the receipt of three hundred talents contracteth alliance with him.

A*NTIOCHUS* calling to mind the manifold losses he had receiued by Simons meanes, inuaded Iury in the fourth year of his raigae, and in the first of Hircanus gouernment, which was in the hundredth sixtie and two Olympiade. And after he had spoiled all the countrey, he locked vp Hircanus within the City of Ierusalem, which he had besieged with seuen camps; yet with no aduantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the walles, as in respect of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his campe; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of raine, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of Aprill. On the North side also where there is a great Plaine, Antiochus caused one hundred towers to be erected euery one three stages high, on which he planted certain companies of armed souldiers; who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the means of a double and deepe trench, rooke from them all their commodities. They on their side made often sallies, and if they chaunced at any time to charge the enemy on the Iordaine; they made a great slaughter: but if they were discouered, they retired souldier-like. But Hircanus considering the great number of people that were in the City, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any seruice, he diuided those that were vsuit for warre and sent them out of the Citie, retaining onely thole with him, who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to haue free liberty to depart; so that wandering here and there betweene the walles and the camp, they were consumed with famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affaires, they that were within had compassion of their countremen, and drew them within the walles, and entertained them within the City. At this time Hircanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seuen daies, by reason of the solemnity of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare vnto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Ierusalem of Bulls with guilded hornes, and vessels full of diuers odors, with other vessels of gold and siluer. Those that had the charge of the gates receiued the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the temple. Antiochus himsele also gaue the souldiers certaine meates to grace their festiuall, shewing himsele herein to be of a farre better disposition then Antiochus Epiphanes, who after hee had taken the Citie, caused swines flesh to be sacrificed vpon the Altar, and besprinkled the temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the lawe of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled and conceived a deadly hatred against him: but Antiochus of whom we speake at this present, was by all men called Deuout, by reason of the incredible affection that he had to the seruice of God.

Hircanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Embassadors vnto him, requiring him that he would permit them to vse the ancient policy of their forefathers. Whereupon the King sequestering all thole farre off from his company, who counsailed him to destroe the Iewish nation, who liued apart and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckning of their words. And vnderstanding that al the cōuersation of the Iewes was conformable vnto pietie, he answered the Embassadors, that if the besieged would yeelde vp their armes and pay the tributes of Ioppe, and the other Cities that were out of Iudæa, and would receiue a garrison, such as hee should appoint; hee would discharge them of this warre. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receiue a garrison; least they should be enforced to entertaine such with whom they could not conuerse; but in steede of the garrison they gaue pledges, and paid five hundred talents of siluer, of which the king receiued three hundred in hand, with the pledges; amongst which was Hircanus brother: and after he had beaten downe the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence; hee raised the siege and departed. But Hircanus opening Dauids monument (who surpassed all other kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same: whereby he took occasion first of all among the Iewes to entertaine a forraigne army. There was also a friendship & confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the City with all his army, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same: And that which more is, Antiochus hauing enterprised an exploit against the Parthians, Hircanus marched also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witness hereof, writing after this manner ner, in his History: Antiochus erected a trophee near the foud Lycus, after he had ouercom the dates general of the army of the Parthians, and abroad there two daies at Hircanus the Iewes request, by reason of a solemne feast at that time, in which it was not lawfull for the Iewes to trauel, wherein he is no waies mistaken. For the feast of Pentecost was at that present the next day after the Sabbath, and it is not lawfull for vs neither in our Sabbath nor feasts to iourney any waies, and Antiochus fighting against Asaces king of the Parthians lost the greater part of his army, and was himselfe slaine. Hircanus maketh a league with the Romans.

Hircanus hearing news of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to finde them disurnished both of garrisons and meanes of defence, as in effect it came to passe. He therefore tooke the Citie of Medaba at the end of six moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards he seized Samega, and the Cities thereof: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a temple there made according to the module of the temple of Ierusalem (which Alexander the great permitted Sanaballath to build in fauour of his sonne in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Iaddus, as we haue heretofore declared) which temple was laid desolate two hundredth yeeres after it was builded. Hircanus also tooke certaine fortresses and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, vnder this condition, that they should consent to be circuncised, and to liue according to the lawes and religion of the Iewes. They thorow the desire they had to liue in the place where they were borne, submitted themselves to be circuncised, and to liue according to the customes and ordinances of the Iewes; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Iewes.

Whilest thus Hircanus was high Priest, he thought good to renewe the amitie betwixt the Iewes and the Romans; and to this effect he sent an embassage with letters vnto the Senate. As soone as the Senate had receiued his letters, they made alliance with him; to this effect eniuing: Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the fildes of Mars the eight day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the sonne of Dositheus Apollonius the sonne of Alexander, Diadormus the sonne of Isaion, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Embassadors by the people of the Iewes, haue proposed; who haue dealt with vs as touching the confederation and amity that this nation had with the Romans, and haue likewise conferred as touching the affaires of estate, namely, that Ioppe and the ports thereof, Gazara and the fountaines thereunto belonging, and those other Cities of the countrey, which Antiochus tooke from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, should be restored vnto them: and that it may not be lawfull for the kings souldiers, to pass thorow their country, neither any of those prouinces, that are vnder their gouernment: and that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this war, contrarie to the arrest and decree of the Senat, should be declared void, to the end that the embassadors sent in the Senates behalf, may prouide for the restitution of those things, which Antiochus hath spoiled them of; and may rate and set downe the domages, which the countrey hath receiued by this war. Item, that commendatory letters should be written in the behalfe of the Iewish embassadors, to the kings and free people for their secure and safe returne into their country. It hath been held conuenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation with men of so good respect, sent vnto them by a nation so good & faithful towards them. And as touching the letters, the answer was; that they should be written, as such time as the affaires of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would haue care that no iniury should be offered them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded also to deliuer the embassadors money out of the common purse to boare their charges home into their countrey: and thus did Fanius dismiss the Embassadors of the Iewes after he had giuen them sifter out of the common treasury, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should condu& them, and giue them assured conuoy to returne into their countrey. And this was the estate of the affaires during Hircanus priesthood.

Hircanus whilst the brothers weaken themselves by ciuill wars liueth in peace.

A But king Demetrius being sharply whetted to make warre against Hircanus, could haue neither time nor occasion to exploit the same, by reason that both the Syrians and his men of war were scarcely well affected towards him, because of his wickednes of life. For they sent Embassadors to Ptolemy, surnamed Physcon, to require him to send some one of Seleucus race vnto them, to take vpon him the kingdome. Whereupon Ptolemy sent them Alexander surnamed Zebina, accompanied with an armie; who waging battell with Demetrius put him to the worst, and constrained him to fly to his wife Cleopatra to Ptolomais: who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was constrained to retire himselfe from thence vnto Tyre; where hee was taken, & after he had suffered many miseries by the hands of his enemies, he finally died. Alexander hauing by this meanes obtained the kingdome, made a league of amity with Hircanus. And whereas it so fell out, that Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, the sonne of Demetrius made warre against him, he was ouercome and slaine in the battell. When as therefore Antiochus had taken possession of the kingdome of Syria, he forbore to make warre againe the Iewes, for that hee had intelligence that his brother by the mothers side (who was in like sort named Antiochus) assembled an army against him at Cyzicus. Remaining therefore in his countrey, he resolved to make preparation against his brothers coming, who was called Cyzicenus, because he was brought vp in that citie, and was the son of Antiochus called the Conseruer, who died in the countrey of the Parthians, & who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus: and it so fell out that both these brothers were married to one and the same Cleopatra, as we haue heretofore expressed. When Antiochus the Cyzicenan was arriued in Syria, he made warre against his brother, which continued many yeeres: during all which time Hircanus liued in peace (for presently after Antiochus death, he reuolted from the subiection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gaue them no succours, neither as subiect, neither as friend; but his fortunes both augmented & flourished greatly during the time of Alexander Zebina, and principally during the raigne of these two brothers. For the war, wherein they consumed one another, gaue Hircanus an opportunity, to leuy all the reuenues of Iudæa, without any contradiction: so that by the same meanes he gathered infinite summes of money. For whilest the Cyzicenan destroyed his brothers countrey, Hircanus also made knowne his inclination and disposition: and seeing likewise that Antiochus was destitute of those succours he expected out of Egypt, and that both himselfe and his brother also (thorow their mutuall discords) weakened one anothers estates, he set as light by the one, as by the other.

CHAP. XVIII.

How Antiochus the Cyzicenan came to the reliefe of the Samaritanes; and how being conquered, hee fled away.

Or which cause he drew forth his army against Samaria (which was a strong Citie) and is at this day called Sebaste, because it was reedified by Herode, as we will make manifest in time and place conuenient. He therefore began to besiege and batter the same with all diligence; animated thereunto, because of the extreame hate he bare the Samaritanes, in that onely to please the kings of Syria they had offered many grievous outrages to the Marissens, who were extracted from, and allied with the Iewes. Hee therefore made a trench round about the Citie, with a double wall of eighty fouds, and committed the generall commaund of this siege to his sonnes Antigonus and Aristobulus, who so diligently and valiantly behaved themselves, that the Samaritanes being ouerpressed with extreame famine, were constrained to eate such things as were vnusuall and vnaccustomed amongst men: and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenan to their rescous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulld by Aristobulus souldiers, and being pursued by the two brethren as farre as Scythopolis, he hardly escaped; and they returning to their siege, freshly assaulted and besieged the Samaritanes within their owne walls: So that once more they were constrained to send Embassadors to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie, who sent vnto Ptolemy Lathyrus for about some six thousand men of warre, who furnished him with them contrarie to his mothers minde, who therefore had almost thrust him out of his dominion. As soone as he had receiued them, he made a roade into Hircanus countrey, and spoiled and foraged the same as farre as Egypt. For he durst not bid him battell hand to hand, because he had not competent forces; but thought that in spoiling the countrey he might cause them to leuy the siege, & forsake Samaria: but after hee had lost a great number of his men by diuers ambuscadoes of his enemies, he went vnto Tripoli, committing the generall charge of that warre to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his captaines. This Callimander more rashly then *G*wisely attempting to set vpon the enemy was himselfe slaine, and his fouldiers discomfited. And Epicrates giuen ouer to couetousnesse did openly yeeld vp Scythopolis and other Cities into the hands of the Iewes: so that it was impossible for either of the to leuy the siege. Finally after that Hircanus had continued his siege before the Citie for the space of one whole yeere, hee became master of the same: and not contenting himselfe with the surprisall hereof, he vtterly destroyed it, enforcing the riuers thorow the midst thereof; yea he ruined the same in such sort, that the mud and soile both of the water and earth tooke away all the appearance of the Citie; so that it seemed as if it had neuer bene. Of this Hircanus there is a certaine incredible matter committed to memorie, namely, how during his high priesthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the very same day wherein his sons fought against Antiochus the Cyzicenean, whilst being himselfe alone, he offered incense in the temple, that he heard a voice, saying, that his two sons had at that present overcome Antiochus: all which hee incontinently signified vnto the people at the gate of the temple; and according as he had said, so it came to passe. See heere what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

About this very instant likewise, the affaires of the Iewes prospered not only in Ierusalem and Iudæa, but also amongst the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus. For Queene Cleopatra rebelling against her sonne Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias as the sonnes of that Onias, who had builded the temple in Heliopolis (according to the patterne of that in Ierusalem) her chiefeistans. And hauing committed her army vnto their hands, shee acted nothing without their aduice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witnesseth, speaking I after this manner. Diuers of those who came with vs, and of those who had bene sent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, sodainly reuolted to Ptolomey: Only the Iewes that were of Onias faction, remained constant in their duty, because the Queene made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their countinmen. Thus saith Strabo. This great felicitie and prosperity of Hircanus moued the Iewes to conceiue a hatred against him, and especially the Pharisees opposed themselves against him. These Pharisees were one of the sects of the Iewes (whereof wee haue heretofore intreated) which sect was so great in credit with the common people, that when they deposed any thing, were it against the king or the high priest, they were presently beleueed. Hircanus had been one of their disciples, and was in like sort very much beloued of them. Hee therefore inuited them to a feast, and entertained them with all humanitie: and seeing that they were set vpon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his minde, how that he desired nothing more then to be iust, and to square all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themselves taught. He therefore required them, that if they perceiued that he mistooke himselfe in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redresse the same. Whereupon all of them gaue testimony of his perfect vertue. Vherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and such a one as delighted in mutiny, said vnto him: Since you desire to heare the truth, if so be you affect the estimation of a good man, giue ouer the place of priesthood, & content your selfe with the gouernment of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cause wherefore hee should forsake the priesthood? Because (saith he) that we haue heard say by our auncestors, that your mother was a captiue during the reign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithstanding was a false report.) Hircanus hearing this, was sore moued against him; as also all other of the Pharisees, who were assisstant in that place. Amongst the rest there was a certaine man called Jonathan, of the order of the Sadduces (who maintaine an opposite opinion against the Pharisees) who was an inward and deere friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the inuiolent speeches that Eleazar had spoken by him, who told him that (as hee thought) Eleazar had spoken these words by the publike consent of the Pharisees; and that he might discouer the same most manifestly, if he enquired of them what punishment Eleazar had deserued for speaking after this sort. Hircanus therefore questioned with the Pharisees as concerning his punishment, telling them that he should very well perceiue, that this injury had not been pronounced by the common consent of them all, if they condemned the offender to suffer a punishment proportionable to his offence. Vherupon they decreed, that hee ought to be punished by imprisonment and scourging, for (saith they) an injury done in word required no capitall punishment: & to speake vprightly, they in their thinking censured seuerely enough of this fault, for that the Pharisees are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any question of punishment. But Hircanus was sore offended with this their answer, and imagined that this Eleazar had spoken after this manner by the common

A common instigation of the rest. This displeasure and conceiued dislike of his, did Jonathan aggravate to the vttermost; and handled the matter in such sort, that he drew Hircanus to forsake the Pharisees, & subscribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, abolishing their ordinances, and causing them to be sharply punished that observed the same. These practices of Hircanus incensed the people against him & his sonnes. But hereof will we speake in another place. At this present I will declare how the Pharisees haue made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the lawes of Moses: for which cause the Sect of the Sadduces reiecteth them, affirming that they ought to keep the written ordinances, and not to obserue those that are grounded vpon the tradition of the fathers: And great dispute & diffensions haue been raised among them vpon this occasion, because the richer sort only, and not the baser sort of people, cleaued vnto the Sadduces: but the Pharisees had the commonality on their sides. But of these two sorts, and of the Esleans, I haue more exactly intreated in my second booke of the wars of the Iewes. But Hircanus finally appealed this mutiny, & liued afterwards in much peace & happines, & after he had most discreetly gouerned his principedome for the space of one and thirty yeeres he died, leauing fise sonnes behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts: the gift of gouernment; the gift of Priesthood; and the gift of prophecy. For God spake vnto him diuers times by Oracles, and Reuelations, & gaue him the knowledge of things to come; which he in such sort foretold, that hee declared that his two eldest sonnes should not possesse the principallitie any long time: whose ende it shall not be amiss to set downe in what manner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may bee the better known.

Aristobulus obtaineth the government, and first of all placeth the kingly Diademe on his head.

After the death of their father, Aristobulus the eldest of his sonnes determined to exchange the principallitie into an absolute estate of a kingdome: and the better to attaine thereunto, he first of all set the diademe vpon his head, foure hundred eightie and one yeeres and three monethes, since the people of the Iewes were deliuered from the seruitude of Babylon, and led againe into their country. And for that Aristobulus amongst all his other brethren, loued Antigonus best of all, who was the neereft vnto him in age, he accepted him as a companion in the government of the kingdome: but as touching the rest, he shut them vp in prison. He locked vp his mother likewise, who had contended with him as concerning the gouernment (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her disposition) and so farre extended his cruelty, that he furnished her to death in prison. After he had thus handled his mother, hee slue his brother Antigonus also; whom hee pretended to loue aboue all the rest, and whom (as hee made shew) he had made partner of his kingdome. From whom he estranged himselfe, by reason of some slaunders and false accusations raised vp against him; which at the first he gaue no credit to, both for that the friendship which hee bare vnto him, made him slightly respect the same, as also for that he imagined that he was enuiously slandered. It came to passe, that Antigonus, returning vpon a certaine time from the armie with great magnificence, about the time of the feast of Tabernacles, chanced to repaire thither at that very time, wherein Aristobulus hapned to fall sicke. Antigonus intending to celebrate the solemnitie ascended the temple in great brauery, attended by some of his army, to make his special prayers for his brothers health. Vherupon certaine malicious wretches, desirous to breake the concord that was betweene them, made vse of this occasion, and of Antigonus magnificent pompe and good fortune; and came vnto the King, amplifying vnto him in malicious words, what pompe and maiestie hee had shewed in that solemnitie, telling him that in these his actions, hee demeaned himselfe in no sort like a private man; but that all his actions were leuelled at a royaltie: finallie, that his intent was to enter the kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that hee made his account that since he might be King alone, it was a great simplicitie for him to haue a companion. But Aristobulus although hee would very hardly bee induced to beleue these reports; yet notwithstanding being desirous both to extinguish the suspicion, and to prouide for his owne securitie, hee disposed certaine of his guard in a darke and priuie place vnder ground, and lodged himselfe in a certaine tower called Antonia, commanding that no man should offer violence, except to those who entered armed: Giuing a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entered armed, he should be slaine.

The year of the world, 3864, before Christ's nativity, 101.

Aristobulus compelleth the Itureans to be circumcised, and to observe the lawes of the Iewes.

Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repaire vnto him without weapons. Which when the Queene and they that complotted the murder of Antigonus understood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that he made warlike preparation and furniture for waite) that in that estate and pompe, & in those royall and warlike accoutrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witness of his braue furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foote toward Aristobulus, to shew himselfe in that brauerie: & when he came right ouer against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very darke, the kings gard slue him.

By this accident a man may easily coniecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of enuie and slaughter, and that there is not any thing that may sooner breake off the good will and amitie amongst brethren, then these two passions. And about all, there is an occasion offered vs of great wonder in respect of one that was called Judas, of the sect of the Effeans; who in all those things that he prophesied, varied in no sort from the truth. He seeing Antigonus come vp into the temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the methode of prophetic) that hee was wearie of his life, because Antigonus security argued the vanity of his prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he should be slain at Stratons tower; whereas the place, where he should be murdered, was fixe hundredth foulds off; and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to haue made a false prediction. Whilest hee debated his doubts after this maner, and was wholly ouercome with choller, newes was brought that Antigonus was slain in a certaine place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name with that other that standeth nere the sea, which was afterward called Cæsarea; which ambiguitie troubled the diuiner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himselfe in that hee had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grievous sickness, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruell murder: so that with grievous agonie and torment he vomited blood, as if all his entrails had bene torne in sunder. This blood so vomited by him, it fortuned (in mine opinion) by the diuine prouidence of God, that a certaine seruant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foote hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had been soyled with the blood of slaughtered Antigonus. By which meanes they that beheld the same, raised a great crie, exclaiming that the Page had shed the blood in a conuenient place. Aristobulus hearing this outcrie demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man addressed himselfe to satisfie him, hee was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, & neuer a man for feare of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon hee altogether dismayed and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth abundant teares, and loaden with grievous sighes, began to cry out in this maner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sodaine punishment of my brothers murder pursueth me: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my soule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and brother? Why dost thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my blood, poured out so many times to those, whom I haue so traiterously slaine? Whilest he pronounced these words, he died, after he had reigned one yeere. He was called Philelles, that is to say, a louer of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his countrie many wayes, and subdued the Itureans, and ioyned the greater part of the countrie to Judæa; and had constrained them likewise, who should remaine in that countrie, to be circumcised, and to liue according to the lawes of the Iewes, he died thus miserably. Hee was by nature courteous and very shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this maner, by the authoritie of Timagenes; This was a courteous man, & profitable to his countrimen the Iewes in many things: for he enlarged their countrie, and conquered a part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he betted vnto him by the bond of circumcision.

When Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we haue heretofore declared, he had shut vp prisoners) and made Lannus (who was called Alexander) king, who both in age and modesty surpassed all the other brethren; but such mishap had he, that from his birth day vpward, his father had conceived so great a hate against him, that he neuer admitted him to his presence so long as he liued. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this. When as Hircannus loued Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sons, with most intire affection, God appeared vnto him in his sleepe, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Whereupon God presented vnto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceived that he should be heire of all his goods; & so much preuailed displeasure with him, that as soon as he was born, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished & brought vp in that place. But God hath apparantly prooued that he lied not to Hircannus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to bee put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe king: and as for the other, who resolved himselfe to liue in idleness and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

After that hee had established his estate; according as hee thought it most expedient, hee led forth his army against Ptolemis: and hauing obtained the vpper hand in the battell, he couped vp the men within their Citie, and afterward besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the Cities of the sea coast, these two onely, namely, Ptolemis and Gaza remained as yet vnconquered, and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seised of the tower of Straton and Dora where he gouerned. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cyzicenus were thus at debate and warre the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were trauailed with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assited them with that army hee had vnder him, and gaue them some succours, by reason that (since these two kings were whetted with intestine troubles and warres) hee cast how to aduance himselfe to the crowne and soueraintie. For these two kings seemed to neglect their owne dangers, resembling herein those wrastlers, who though being wearied with fight; yet are ashamed to submit vnto their aduersarie, but giue themselves a breathing time, that they may the better bee heartened to encounter. The onely hopes they had were in the kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Isle of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himselfe after he had been driuen out of his kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadors as vnto their allie, requiring him to come and deliuer them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These embassadors perswaded him, that if he would passe into Syria, he should haue both Zoilus to friend, and thole of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreouer, they assured him that the Sidonians and diuers others would second him: and by this meanes so encouraged him with promises, that he hastened himselfe to set saile.

But in the meane space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authoritie with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazard themselves in some vncertaine danger, wherewith the Iewes threatened them, then to deliver themselves into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest seruitude. And moreouer, not onely to sustaine a present war; but that which is more, an imminent war from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should leuy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her selfe also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more returne againe to Cyprus; where as they were to expect no lesse but extreame danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, vnderstood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foote and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemis; and perceiving that vpon his encamping, they of the Citie admitted not his embassadors, quire aide against the Iewes, at Ptolemis hands. of Gaza were come vnto him; requiring him to yeeld them assistance; for that their countrie was destroyed destroyed by the Iewes, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais, for feare of Ptolomey, and retiring his armie into his owne countrey, he began to vse this stratageme. For couertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; & openly he made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to giue him foure hundred talents of siluer, provided that he would deliuer him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him vnto the Iewes. Ptolomey hauing made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he vnderstood that Alexander had sent and incited his mother against him, hee brake all accord, and went and besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertaine him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces, hee departed with the rest, to enter vpon and spoile the countrey of Iudæa. Alexander perceiuing Ptolomey's intent, assembled about fiftie thousand fighting men of his owne countrey, H (or as some historians haue written, eightie thousand) with whom hee went out to fight against Ptolomey, who sodainly setting vpon Azoch a city of Galilee on a Sabbath day, tooke it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantitie of other bootie.

Afterwards set vpon Sephor a citie neere vnto Azoch, from whence he departed with the losse of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make I head against him, and met with him neere vnto Iordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right ouer against the enemy. He had in his vanguard eight thousand men, whome he called Combattants by the hundredths: who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomey's forward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiuing themselves to bee inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazard battell. But Philostephanus the campmaster did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to passe the flood, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the riuer on their backs, hee should be the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselves from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought, with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiuing that Alexander's army had the better, he tooke a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselves. The wing of the Iewes vanguard that saw themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any meanes, began to flie; and so farre were those that marched next them, from yeelding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomey's side behaued themselves farre otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarmed them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their armes with killing them. It is reported that thirtie thousand men were slaine in the battell (Timagenes saith, fiftie thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and other some fled vnto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victorie, hee ouerranne and spoiled the whole L countrey, and in the euening he quartered himselfe in certaine villages of Iudæa, which he found full of women & children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into peeces; and afterwards to cast the morfels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod to eate the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, & retired to their owne habitations, should know that their enemies would eate mans flesh; that by this meanes they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this manner, as I haue declared. And Ptolomey tooke Ptolemais also by force, as I haue made knowne else where.

But Cleopatra perceiuing how her sonne prospered, and how hee had spoiled Iewry without M any preiudice, and subiected the citie of Gaza to his commaund: shee concluded with her selfe, that shee ought not to suffer him to increase after that manner, considering it was vpon the borders of Egypt, whose souerainty he affected. For which cause, shee sodainly marched out against him, with an armie both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces of Chelcias and Ananias, both Iewes; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Isle of Coos, with her nephewes, and her testament, to be reserved and kept there in safety. And after she had commanded

Amanded her sonne Alexander to set saile toward Phoenicia, with a great navy, because the inhabitants of that countrey were reuolted from her obedience: the her selfe departed and came to Ptolemais, and besieged it, when shee perceived that they refused to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Egypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he should find the countrey disurnished of men of warre. But his purpose failed him. At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatra's army, died in Coelosyria; beeing in pursuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra hauing tydings of her sonnes enterprise, and that the successe & fortune he expected in Egypt had failed him, shee sent part of her army to driue him out of the countrey; so that he was enforced to returne backe againe out of Egypt, and to goe and spend his winter at Gaza. Meane while Cleopatra besieged and tooke the Citie of Ptolemais, whicher Alexander resorted vnto her, with great pretents, and an answerable respect vnto his fortune, who had been so vntowardly handled by Ptolomey, hauing now no other recourse left him but to her fauour and assistance. Vpon his arrival, certaine of her familiars counselled her to lay hands on him, and to seize the countrey; and not to permit that so greata number of Iewes, and they so valiant men, should become subiects vnto one man. But Ananias gaue her counsaile to the contrary, alleading that she should commit an act of great iniustice, if she should depose him, who was her allye, from the gouernment; who was beside that, very neerly allied vnto her. For (saith he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Iewes a hainous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming herselfe according to Ananias counsaile, resolved with her selfe to offer Alexander no iniurie; but in steed thereof, she entertained him as her C allye and friend, at Scythopolis a Citie of Coelosyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that hee was discharged of the feare which he had conceiued in respect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Coelosyria, and after six moneths siege, tooke Gadara: hee tooke shortly after Apollodotus captaine of the Gazans made a sally by night, and entred the campe of the Iewes, hauing onely with him two thousand strange souldiers, & one thousand of his owne followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazans had the vpper hand; because that they made their enemies believe that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Iewes afresh: but as soone as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soone as the Iewes were assured of the truth, they turned back vpon them, and charging the Gazans, they slew about some one thousand fighting men of them.

This did not any waies astonish Alexander: but notwithstanding the disaster, he marched forward toward the Cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, situate on the sea coasts, and tooke them perforce; and seeing that Ptolomey was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Egypt, hee besieged the citie of Gaza, and spoiled D all the countrey round about it, by reason of the displeasure which hee had conceiued against the citizens, for that they had sought their assistance at Ptolomey's hands against him. Against him Apollodotus captaine of the Gazans made a sally by night, and entred the campe of the Iewes, hauing onely with him two thousand strange souldiers, & one thousand of his owne followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazans had the vpper hand; because that they made their enemies believe that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Iewes afresh: but as soone as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soone as the Iewes were assured of the truth, they turned back vpon them, and charging the Gazans, they slew about some one thousand fighting men of them.

All this notwithstanding, they bethought them on no surrender, but stood out, being neither E amated with losse of men, or lack of prouision whatsoeuer, resolving themselves rather to endure any misery, then to submit themselves into the hands of their enemies: and that which made the more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas king of Arabia, who had promised no lesse. But it came to passe that Apollodotus was slaine before his arriual, and the citie taken. For Lyfimachus his brother conceiued a ialousie against him, by reason of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him; and hauing slaine him, & gathered those fighting men that he might, he yeilded vp the Citie vnto Alexander, who at the first made a peaceable entrie, but afterwards dispersed his souldiers, and gaue them licence to execute all hostilitie against the Citizens: so that they acted their crueltie in euery place, and slew many of the Gazans: Neither did these citizens vneueged, but so manfully behaued they themselves, that they butchered no lesse F number of Iewes, then they murdered citizens among them. Some of them likewise perceiuing themselves to be alone, set fire vpon their houses, taking away first that which was therein; to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their spoiles. Other some killed their wiues and children with their owne hands, meaning this way to deliuer them from the enemies seruitude. But the Senators, to the number of 5 hundred, were fled into the temple of Apollo (for at such time as the enemy entred the towne, they were by chance assembled in counsell) all these did Alexander put to the sword; and instantly rased and leuelled that Citie with the ground: which done, he returned to Ierusalem, after he had spent one whole yeere at the siege before Gaza.

About this time Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, died by the treason of Hieracleon, in the fortie and fift yeere of his age, and in the nine and twentieth of his raigne. His sonne Seleucus had the kingdome after him, who made warre against his vnckle Antiochus, surnamed Cyzecenus, and hauing ouercome and taken him, he slew him. Not long after, Antiochus the sonne of Cyzecenus, & Antoninus, surnamed the Deuout, came to Arade, and placed the Diademes vpon their heads, & made warre against Seleucus, whom they ouercame in one conflict, and draue him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriuing againe in the Cittie of the Mopseates, he exacted a sum of money at the Citizens hands. But the people were so incensed, that they set fire on his palace; whereby it came to passe, that both he and his friends were burned to dust. During the time that Antiochus the son of Cyzecenus raigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre H against him; but he was not onely ouercome, but both hee and his army were put to the sword. After him, Philip his sonne tooke the Diademe, and gouerned in certaine places of Syria.

Meane while Ptoleme Lathurus sent to Gnidus for his fourth brother Demetrius Eucerus, and made him king of Damasco. Against these two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant resist, but died very shortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to succour the Queene of the Galadonians, who made warre against the Parthians, hee died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip possessed Syria, as hereafter shall be declared. As for Alexander, a domestical sedition was raised against him; for the people arose and mutined at such time, as hee assisted at the Altar to solemnize the feast of Tabernacles, and during the time that hee intended the sacrifice, they cast Citrons at him: for (as we haue declared elswhere) the Iewes haue this custome, I that on the feast of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palme, and of Citrons. They vpbraided him also with many iniurious speeches, reproching him, that hee had been prisoner in warre; and that he was also vnworthy of the honour of the Priesthood. Whereupon, hee being moued by these disgraces, slaughtered about fixe thousand men: and hauing made an inclosure of wood about the temple and the altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Priests) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained also certaine strange souldiers Pisidians and Cilicians. For in that he was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no vse of them.

After this, hauing ouercome the Arabians, hee constrained the Moabites and Galaadites to pay him tribute, and destroyed the Cittie of Amath whilst Theodore for feare gaue ouer to restit him. But encountering with Obeda the king of Arabia, and being surprisid and betrayed by an ambuscado in certaine miry and vnhauited places, hee was thrust by the presse of the Camels into a deepe trench (neere vnto Gadara a village of Galaad) from whence he almost despaired to escape: notwithstanding, auoiding that danger, he came to Ierusalem. And besides this his last mishap, the people hated him, against whom he made warre for the space of fixe yeeres, and slew at the least fiftie thousand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit these hainous debates betweene them, the more grievous displeasure conceiued they against him, because of the inconuenients they had suffered: so that when he demanded of them what they would haue him to doe: they all of the with one voice cried out, that he should kill himselfe. And thereupon they presently sent messengers to Demetrius Eucerus, requesting him of his fauour and assistance.

But after that Alexander had fled vnto the mountaines, diuers Iewes (to the number of fixe thousand) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and thotow the feare they had of Demetrius, resorted vnto him; which when the Conquerer heard, he retired himselfe. After this, the Iewes made warre against Alexander, and in diuers losses which they receiued, there died a great number of the in diuers combats: Finally, after he had closed vp the most strongest amongst them in the Cittie of Bethom, hee besieged them; and after hee had taken the Cittie, and brought them vnder his subiection, he carried them to Ierusalem, where he perpetrated an vnspcakable & cruell murder. For whilst he banquetted with his concubines, in the sight of them all, hee commaunded eight hundred of them or thereabout to be crucified; & before their eyes whilst they yet liued, he caused their wiues and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to reuenge himselfe of those wrongs which he had receiued: But he exceeded the bounds of humanitie herein, notwithstanding they had rebelled against him, and reduced him into a most pitious estate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdome. For being not content to assaile & make warre vpon him with their forces; they drew strangers also into his countrey against him: and finally, they ouerpressed him in such sort, that hee was constrained to yeeld vp into the king of Arabias hands, the countries and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites; for fear least they should ioyne with the Iewes, and make warre against him; besides other innumerable iniuries and outrages committed by them against him. This notwithstanding it cannot be excused, but that hee ouerthor himselfe herein; so that by reason of this his so enormous crueltie, he was called Thracidas, that is to say, as cruell as a Thracian: and this title continued amongst the Iewes. The souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thousand, fled by night into strong and sure holds; and as long as Alexander liued, they were in exile. But at the last, after hee was deliuered of all these troubles, hee liued in quier, and gouerned his kingdome peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing fro Iudaea to Bercea, besieged his brother Philip with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse. But Straton Lord of Bercea, allied to Philip, called Zirus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces gouernour of the Parthians, vnto his helpe; who repairing vnto him with great forces, besieged Demetrius in his owne trenches, in which they so inclosed him by continuall shooting of darts, & want of water, that they constrained him, and those that were with him, to submit themselves to their mercie. When as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were seized of Demetrius, they sent D him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was king of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of the as were found in the camp, were suffered to depart with the safetie of their liues & baggage, and to returne to Antioch. But Mithridates, king of Parthia honored Demetrius by all means possible, vntill such time as he was surprized with a sicknes, whereof hee died. Incontinently after the battel, Philip came into Antioch, & hauing obtained the kingdome ruled ouer Syria.

Efter this, Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philips brother) came into Damasco to obtaine the souerainie therein, and there in short space accomplishing his affaires, got possession of the crowne. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readines to inuade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damasco with great speed, and made him surrender vp the Cittie, both by the means of Milesius whom Antiochus had left gouernour in the Castle, as also by the consent of the Citizens themselves. But Philip shewed himselfe vngratefull toward Milesius, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at such time as he deliuered him the Cittie; because his intent was, that the world should thinke that the feare of his power, and not Milesius fauour, was the cause of the surprisall of Damasco. Which act of his drew him into suspition with Milesius, and was the cause that hee lost the Cittie againe. For departing from thence to exercise himselfe at tilt, Milesius lockt the gates against him; and kept the Cittie for Antiochus. Who hauing intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, & at that very instant led his army into Iudaea, in which there were eight thousand footmen, and eight hundred horsemen. Alexander fearing his approche, made a deepe trench from Caparfab (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the sea of Ioppe (vvhich was the onely streight whereby he might be assailed) and made a wall furnished with wooden towers, with their courts of guard; distant the one from the other an hundred and fiftie furlongs; to keepe done, he returned to Ierusalem, after he had spent one whole yeere at the siege before Gaza. About this time Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, died by the treason of Heracleon, in the fortie and fift yeere of his age, and in the nine and twentieth of his raigne. His sonne Seleucus had the kingdome after him, who made warre against his vnkle Antiochus, surnamed Cyzicenus, and hauing overcome and taken him, he slew him. Not long after, Antiochus the sonne of Cyzicenus, & Antoninus, surnamed the Deuout, came to Arade, and placed the Diademes vpon their heads, & made warre against Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and draue him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriuing againe in the Cittie of the Mopseates, he exacted a sum of money at the Citizens hands. But the people were so incensed, that they set fire on his palace; whereby it came to passe, that both he and his friends were burned to dust. During the time that Antiochus the son of Cyzicenus raigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre against him; but he was not onely overcome, but both he and his army were put to the sword. After him, Philip his sonne tooke the Diademe, and gouerned in certaine places of Syria.

Meane while Ptolomey Lathurus lent to Gnidus for his fourth brother Demetrius Eucerus, and made him king of Damasco. Against these two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant resist, but died very shortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to succour the Queene of the Galadonians, who made warre against the Parthians, hee died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip possessed Syria, as hereafter shall be declared. As for Alexander, a domestical sedition was raised against him; for the people arose and mutined at such time, as hee assisted at the Altar to solemnize the feast of Tabernacles, and during the time that hee intended the sacrifice, they cast Citrons at him: for (as we haue declared elswhere) the Iewes haue this custome, I that on the feast of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palme, and of Citrons. They vpbraided him also with many iniurious speeches, reproching him, that hee had been prisoner in warre; and that he was also unworthy of the honour of the Priesthood. Whereupon, hee being moued by these disgraces, slaughtered about sixe thousand men: and hauing made an inclosure of wood about the temple and the altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Priests) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained also certaine strange souldiers Pisidians and Cilicians. For in that he was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no vse of them.

After this, hauing overcome the Arabians, hee constrained the Moabites and Galaadites to pay him tribute, and destroyed the Cittie of Amath whilst Theodore for feare gaue ouer to resist him. But encountering with Obeda the king of Arabia, and being surprised and betrayed by an ambuscado in certaine miry and vnhaunted places, hee was thrust by the presse of the Camels into a deepe trench (neere vnto Gadara a village of Galaad) from whence he almost despaired to escape: notwithstanding, auoiding that danger, he came to Ierusalem. And besides this his last mishap, the people hated him, against whom he made warre for the space of sixe yeeres, and slew at the least fiftie thousand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit these hainous debates betwene them, the more gricuous displeasure conceiued they against him, because of the inconuenients they had suffered: so that when he demanded of them what they would haue him to doe: they all of the with one voice cried out, that he should kill himselfe. And thereupon they presently sent messengers to Demetrius Eucerus, requesting him of his fauour and assistance.

keepe backe Antiochus. But he fired all these his fortifications, and made his army passe into Arabia thorow this streight. The king of Arabia retired vpon the first assault; but afterwards presently came into the field with tenne thousand horlmen: whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onser lost his life (yet with victorie) whilst hee sought to succour a company of his men that were hardly laid to. After Antiochus death, his army retired to the burrow of Cana, where diuers of them died for hunger.

After him Aretas reigned in Coelosyria, who was called vnto that kingdom by those that held Damascus and hared Ptolomey the sonne of Mennaus. Aretas led his army into Iewry, and gotte victorie against Alexander neere to Adida: which done, he retired out of Iudaea, vpon a composition made betweene them. Moreover, once more Alexander marched towards the Citie of Dion, and tooke the same. And afterwards he led his army against Essa, where Zeno had hoorded H vp his chiefe riches: and before he assailed the fortresse, he inuironed the place with three huge walles, which he builded round about it, and hauing taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, & Seleucia: which when hee had ouercome, hee made himselfe master of a valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortresse of Gamala. And obiecing many crimes against Demetrius the Lord of those places, hee dispossessed him of his government. Finally, after hee had made warre for the space of three whole yeeres, hee returned into his countrey; where the Iewes entertained him willingly by reason of the happy exploits which he had archieued.

About the same time the Iewes were already possessed of the cities of Syria, Idumaea, & Phoenicia; of the tower of Straton, Apollonia, Ioppe, Iamnia, Azoth, Gaza, Anchedon, Raphia, Rhinocura, all which were neere vnto the Sea: and in the firme land on the side of Idumaea, as Adora, Marissa, and all Samaria; the mounts Carmel and Itabyr; and herewith Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, Gabala; and of Monb, Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Orona, Telichon, & Zaira; Antona of Cilicia and Pella. This last Citie was rased by them, because the inhabitants would not promise to conuert themselves to the religion of the Iewes) with diuers other of the principall Cities of Syria also, which were conquered by them.

After this, king Alexander fell sicke, by the meanes of his surfeit & drunkennesse; and for the space of three yeeres he was traualled with a quartanague. This notwithstanding, he was alwaies in the campe, vntill such time as being wearied with traualles, he died in the marches of the countrey of the Gerasens, at such time as hee besieged Ragaba (which is a Castle situate on the other side of Iordan.) The queene perceiving that he was at deaths doore, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recouerie; shee began to weepe and lament, and to beate her breasts, because both she and her children were likely now to bee left desolate, and in these words shee bemoaned her selfe vnto him. To whom wilt thou leaue both me and thy children in the estate, wherein we be? or why should we surriue or liue one after another, considering that thou assuredly knowest, that the hearts of thy people are estranged from vs? Hereupon the king comforted her, and gaue her this counsaile, that if she would assure the kingdome both vnto her & her children, she should behaue her selfe according to his direction: which was, first to conceale his death, and not to suffer his men of warre to haue notice thereof, vntill such time as she had taken this Castle. Which done, he aduised her to repaire to Ierusalem in pompe, and triumph; and that beeing there, shee should bestow some authoritie vpon the Pharisees, who should recount her praises, & obtaine her fauour amongst the people. For (said hee) these kind of men are in great estimation and credit with the people, and can doe much hurt vnto those they hate, and further them in like sort verie mightily, towards whom they are well affected: For the people easily belieueth them, when they vigeought against any man, notwithstanding it be of enuie; and that he himselfe also had incurred the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them.

When as therefore (said hee) thou shalt arriue in Ierusalem, send thou for the chiefe amongst them, and pray them to come vnto thee; and after you haue shewed them my dead bodie, vse the most plausible speech that you can, and giue them permission to dispose of my bodie as they list, whether it bee their pleasure to interdict and deny mee funerall (in that they haue received many indignities by mee) or whether in auengement of their displeasure, they will offer any ignominie to my bodie: and promise you them that you will doe nothing in the administration or government of the kingdome, but by their aduise. If in this sort you shape both your manners and discourse towards them, it will come to passe, that I shall bee buried by them with great magnificence (which otherwise I could not bee by any other meanes) because they will offer no outrage to my bodie, no although you should permitte them: and besides that, you shall raigne in more assurance and quiet.

CHAP. XXIIII.

After Alexanders death, his wife Alexandra governeth the kingdome.

After that Alexandra had taken the Castle of Ragaba, shee conferred with the Pharisees, according to her husbands counsaile, and committed vnto their discretion, not onely that which concerned her husbands obsequies, but also the government of the kingdome: whereby shee not onely appeased the displeasure which before time they had conceived against Alexander, but also obtained their good will and amitie. They therefore came and declaimed amongst the people, making an oration of the acts and gests of Alexander, complaining euery where that they had lost a good king, and by the enforced praises that they vsed, they incited the people to great griefe and lamentation: so that they buried him with more magnificence, then any king that reigned before him. This Alexander left two sons behind him, the one called Hircanus; the other Aristobulus; and by his testament committed the government of the kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affaires, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Aristobulus, who was the younger, was both active & fit for government. The people were well affected towards Alexandra, because she had manifestly expressed how greatly she misliked her husbands misgovernment.

She appointed Hircanus high priest (both in regard of his age, as also for that by nature he was composed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the disposition of the Pharisees, commanding the people to obey and obserue them. She also renewed and confirmed that which Hircanus had disannulled, and the Pharisees (according to the customes of their forefathers) had introduced; so that she bare the name, & the Pharisees the authoritie roiall. For they restored such as were banished, to their estates, and deliuered prisoners; and in all things they demeaned themselves like great Lords. Alexandra also for her part vndertooke the care of the common-weale, & kept a great number of souldiers in pay, and increased her power in such sort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and deliuered her hostages & pledges of peace. All the countrey was at quiet, onely the Pharisees troubled the queene, perswading her to put those to death, who had containted king Alexander to put those eight hundred to death (of whom wee haue spoken before) & they themselves afterwards slew one that was called Diogenes, & after him diuers others, one by one: vntill such time as those in authoritie came vnto the roiall palace, accompanied with Aristobulus (who seemed to be displeased with that which had hapned, and who if the occasion were offered, made shew that he would not permit his mother to gouern after that manner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had beene, to expresse their dutie and loialtie which they ought to their deceased master; and how for that cause they had been greatly honoured by him; requiring her that she would not utterly frustrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their seruice, that now they that had escaped from the danger of their forraigne enemies, were in their houses murdered like beasts by their priuate maligners, without any reliefe or succours from any one. They furthermore vrged, that if their aduersaries would content themselves with those they had slaine, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reason of the sincere affection they bare vnto their Lords: but if they must needly as yet suffer the like, they required that they might haue licence to depart. For that they would not procure their thairfetic, otherwise then by her consent: and would rather suffer a voluntarie death neer vnto her roiall palace, if they might not bee spared: for that it would be a shame both for themselves, and for the Queene, if by her toleration, those, who had beene her deceased husbands friends, should be thus vexed by them which were his aduersaries.

That Aretas king of Arabia and other princes, would be glad of this newes, to heare that shee should estrange those persons farre from her, whose names haue beene dreadfull euen amongst those neighbouring kings who haue but heard the same. And if she had resolved to make more account of the Pharisees fauour, then of their seruice, they besought her that shee would at leastwise distribute them in seuerall Castles, for that rather then any mishap should pursue their soueraine Alexanders house, they were content to lead their liues in that contemptible and abiect condition. Whilst thus they spake, and exclaimed on the soule of Alexander, praying him to haue compassion as well of those that were already dead, as of those who were in danger of their liues liues, the teares ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus (about the rest) was har-tily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselves were the cause of their owne calamitie, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a headstrong & ambitious woman to raigne ouer the, as if the king had no heires referred to succeed him in the kingdom. The Queene vncertaine how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reseruing onely Hircania, Alexandria, and Machæron, wherein the Princes moueables and wealth was kept.

Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Menna, who was an ill neighbor vnto that Citie: but he returned thence without archieuing any memorable action. About the same time newes was brought, that Tigranes king of Armenia inuaded Syria, with five hundred thousand men of war, intending shortly to set vpon Iewry. This rumour affrighted the queene, and all the communitie (and not without cause.) Whereupon shee sent Embassadors with many princelie presents vnto Tigranes, who besieged the Citie of Ptolemais. (For queene Selena, otherwise called Cleopatra, rained in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alex-andras Embassadors met with the king of Armenia, & besought him to conceiue a good opinion of their queene, and of all the whole nation of the Iewes: who receiued them willingly, praying them for that they had sought him out so farre to doe him honor, & put them in good hope.
After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fledde into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and foraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this newes, returned back into his countrie.

After this, queene Alexandra fell sicke of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristo-bulus tooke occasion to entremeddle with the affaires of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie seruant, he repaired vnto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers gouernment, & now was the more afraid that if shee should happen to die, all her posteritie should be made subiect to the power of the Pharisees. For he well perceived how vnapt his elder brother was to gouern the kingdome, vnto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. Hee therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefe Potentates commaunded, to who entertained him with great ioy.

The next day, the queene hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected he at the first, that he was retired to worke some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surprisid by Aristobulus: at that time both the queene and the whole nation were dismayed, fearing least hee should presently vsurpe the soue-raignie; but about all they feared, least hee should reuenge himselfe on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife & children should be committed to the Castle, that adioyned the temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a king: for in the space of some fiftene daies he took twen-tie and two forts, whether hee made his retreats, and assembled an armie of souldiers, and leuied them amongst the Lords that inhabite Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwaies resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintaine and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as beeing those that were the occasion of the conformation of his Monarchie.

Heereupon the ancient Iewes and Hircanus repaired vnto the queene, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsaile and good aduice touching the present affaires, because that Aristo-bulus her sonne was already well nigh Lord of the whole countrie, since he had so many forts vnder his commaund: Furthermore, that it was inconuenient and vndecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding shee were grievously sicke, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The queene willed them to doe that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weale; telling them that they had many meanes, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong; and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasurie: certifying them, that because shee knew that she had not long to liue, shee had no more reason to take care of those affaires. Anon after shee had spoken thus, shee died; after shee had reigned nine yceres, and liued in all seauentie and three yceres. This woman was adorned with

A with greater excellency then could bee expected from one of hir sexe, and expressed both in her actions and ordinances how fitte she was to gouerne a kingdome, and how oftentimes men tho-row imprudence ouerthooge themselves in affaires of estate. For making more account of the present then future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in respect of those which are requisite in a moderated gouernment, shee neuer vpon any instigation whatsoeuer perueried iustice; notwithstanding her family fell into such inconueniences, that the same souerainie, which shee had obtained by diuers daungers and trauels, was not long after that ruined and lost for her scarce effeminate desires. For shee gave eare vnto those, who were ill affected towards her posteritie, and left the kingdome destitute of such as were fit to gouerne; so that the gouernment which shee enjoyed during her life time, was after her death distracted with infinite troubles, and calamities, wherewith her family was replenished. And notwithstanding her regiment after this manner, yet during her life time she kept the kingdome in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

CHAP. I.

How after the contention betweene the two brethren touching the Kingdome, it was agreed that Aristobulus should be King, and Hircanus live as a priuate man.

The yeare of the world, 3890, before Christ's birth 65. The office and dutie of an Historiographer.

We haue already intreated in our former Booke both of the adces and death of Queene Alexandra: it now remaineth at this present to prosecute and continue the sequell of our History, to the end that we neither omit any thing thorow ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulness. For they that make profelion to write Histories, and to recite such things as are obserued by antiquitie, ought not only studioustly to conforme their stile, but also to beautifie the same with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the reader may conuerse in their writings with the more delectation. But about all things they must haue an especiall care so exactly to set downe the truth, that they, who know not how these things came to passe, may be the more duely and fitly informed.

Aristobulus and Hircanus strive for the kingdome.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken vpon him the high Priesthoode, in the third yeere of the hundredth seuentie and seuenth Olympiade, and in the yeere that Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus called the Cretensian were consuls at Rome: Aristobulus sodainly vnderooke the warre against Hircanus, and fought with him neere vnto Iericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers submitted themselves of their owne accord to Aristobulus. Thorow which accident Hircanus was enforced to fly to the fortresse of the higher citie, wherein Alexandra Aristobulus mother had imprisoned both his wife & children (as before this is specified.) The rest of the faction for feare of his brother, who had gotten the victorie, retired themselves within the enclosure of the Temple, where they were besieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their different was accorded in this manner: that Hircanus should passe the remnant of his life without intermedling with affaires of estate, but should onely intend his securitie and peace; and Aristobulus should command the kingdome. This league was ratified betweene them in the temple, and confirmed with oathes, coniunction of hands and embraces, in the sight of all the people: which being finished, Aristobulus retired himselfe into the palace; and Hircanus to Aristobulus lodging, to lead a priuate and quiet life.

CHAP. II.

Of the race of Antipater, and how he is aduanced to high estate, and how Hircanus flieth to Aretas King of Arabia.

Heio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Antipater the Idumæan Hircanus friend Antipater of Iudaea, as Nicholas Damascene writeth of this man, that he was descended from the noblest amongst those Iewes who returned from out of Babylon into Iurie: but this hee did of set purpose to gratifie Herode Antipaters sonne, who by a casualtie became afterwards King of the Iewes (as we will expresse hereafter in time and place conuenient.) This Antipater was at the first called Antipas, according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made

A made gouernour of all Idumæa by king Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Afcalonites, corrupting them, and insinuating himselfe into their fauours by diuers great presents bestowed vpon them. This young Antipater considering with himselfe what Aristobulus power was, and fearing least some mischief might befall him thorow the hatred the yong king had conceiued against him, he communicated with certaine of the greatest reckoning amongst the Iewes, and secretly and cunningly incensed them against Aristobulus, telling them that they had done amisse, both to see and suffer Aristobulus to detain the kingdome vniuistly in his hands, and to dispossesse his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. He likewise accosted and founded Hircanus ordinarily with these words; telling him that he liued in danger of his life, and would doubtlesse bee ouertaken except hee sought his owne security, and fled his imminent perill: allcadging, that Aristobulus friends would neuer cease to consult how they might shorten his life, to the end that hee might live in more securitie. To these instigations of his, Hircanus gaue small credit (for that of his own nature he was curteous, and could not easily be it duced or seduced by detractions) but this negligence and carelesse in him, was the cause that hee was accounted a silly and abiect man. On the contrarie side, Aristobulus was of a different and more heroick nature, being more actiue in performance, and carefull preuention.

Now although Antipater saw that Hircanus made small account of his instigations; yet ceased he not daily to inuent and propose new surmises & accusations, vrging Aristobulus hatred and practise to murder him: so much preuailed hee by his importunitie, that at last he perswaded him to fly to Aretas king of Arabia, promising him that in so doing, he would giue him both aide and assistance. Hircanus hauing debated vpon these conclusions, at last thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined vpon Iewry.) Whereupon he first of all sent Antipater to Aretas, to take assurance of him that hee should not betray him into his enemies hands, if so be he should submit himselfe vnto him, and require his assistance. When as therefore Antipater had receiued this assurance from the king, he returned to Ierusalem vnto Hircanus: & not long after that tooke him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great iourneies arriued at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall court. And for that hee was inwardly familiar with the king he besought him to reestablish him in the kingdome of Iewry, and wrought so much by his importunitie and the presents which he gaue him, that he perswaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Aretas promised, that if hee confirmed him againe in his royall dignitie, hee would vpon the recouery of his realme restore vnto him those twelue Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names wherof are these that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Liuias, Tharabasi, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Narissa, Rydda, Lusa, Oryba.

Aristobulus being vanquished, is pursued as farre as Ierusalem.

E Aretas induced by these promises, was content to send forth an armie against Aristobulus, and himselfe in person conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thousand men both on foote and horse, and had the vpper hand of his enimie in such sort, as diuers after the attainment of this victorie, of their owne accord submitted themselves to Hircanus: and Aristobulus perceiuing himselfe to be destitute of all his friends and followers fled vnto Ierusalem. After him the king of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and besieged him in the temple: In this siege the common people assisted Hircanus, neither were there any but the priests only that stuck to Aristobulus side. Whereupon Aretas marshalled the forces he had, and busily set the army both of Iewes and Arabians about the siege. Whilest these things were vnder these tearmes, the feast of vnleauened bread, which we call the passeouer, was at hand, and the princes of the Iewes forsaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certaine man called Onias (such a one who for his vertue was beloued of God, and in times past had by his deuout praies and supplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God) hid himselfe, perceiuing that this sedition would be of some continuance. This man therefore being surprised and brought into the campe of the Iewes, they requiured him that as by his praies he had obtained water; so at that time likewise he would by his imprecations incense God against Aristobulus, and his accomplices. But whereas he contradicted and excused himselfe, he was at last constrained constrained by the people to performe their request; so that standing vp in the midst of them he spake after this manner. O God, king of the whole world, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy priests; I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewise they shall prouoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them. Hereupon, a certaine sort of reprobate souldiers amongst the Iewes, hearing these words of his, stoned him to death: but God incontinently punished this cruelty in them; & the murder of Onias so curiously perpetrated, was reuenged by this meanes which ensueth. At such time as Aristobulus & the priests were besieged, the feast of Easter or the pasche fell out, during which time it was an vsuall custome amongst the Iewes to honour God with many sacrifices: Now for that they who were with Aristobulus, had not any beastes to offer vp in sacrifice, they required the other Iews which were without, that they might haue some deliuered vnto the for their money. Whereunto it was answered, that if they would giue one thousand drachmes for euery head, they should haue some deliuered vnto them. To this demand of theirs, Aristobulus and the priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let downe the prefixed price and deliuered the same from the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, deliuered them not those beastes which they required them to sell them for sacrifice; but so farre were they giuen ouer to impiety, that they falsified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the priests (being defrauded in this manner contrarie to the oath and protestations of their aduersaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their countreimen, that had committed this haughty and perurious impiety: neither did God defer their punishment any long time, but incontinently after he sent a great and violent winde, that spoiled all the fruits of the country; so that a measure of wheat was sold for eleuen drachmes.

Hircanus and Aristobulus send Embassadors To Scaurus, to couenant their peace with him.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4. Hircanus and Aristobulus embassadors vnto Scaurus.

Scaurus is presented.

Aristobulus maketh warre against Aretas and Hircanus.

When Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria (himselfe being in person detained in Armenia in pursuit of the war betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came vnto Damasco, he found that Metellus & Lollius had newly taken the citie; for which cause he marched onward towards Iewry: Where being arriued, certaine Embassadors came vnto him in the behalfe of Aristobulus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacie in the behalfe of them both, & offering in eithers respect a tribute of foure hundred talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobulus promises, both for that hee was a man of mightier substance and greater minde, & withall more moderate in his demand; whereas Hircanus was poore and couetous, & notwithstanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promise of lesse assurance: For it was a harder matter to subdue a Citie that was so defended & strong, then to repulse a troupe of runnagate Nabatheans, & they scarcely well animated to prosecute that warre. For these causes therefore he (receiuing his money) leuiued the siege, commanding Aretas to returne; which if he refused, hee declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damasco, and Aristobulus led forth his army against Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron he obtained the victorie, and slew about some seuen thousand of his enemies, amongst the number of which was Cephalus Antipaters brother.

CHAP. V.

How Aristobulus and Hircanus debate their titles in the presence of Pompey.

Pompey cometh into Syria, and Aristobulus sendeth a royall present vnto him.

Not long time after this, Pompey came vnto Damasco: & as he traualled thorow Coelosyria, diuers Embassadors resorted vnto him fro all parts of Syria, Egypt & Iudaea. For Aristobulus sent him a present of great valew, namely a golden vine of five hundred talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in these words: There came an Embassadors out of Egypt, bearing a crowne of foure thousand pieces of gold; and an other from Iewry, with a vine or garden, and the workmanship was called Terpole, that is to say,

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 6.

A say, recreation: And this vine haue we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, hauing the inscription of Alexander king of the Iewes; and it was esteemed and valued at five hundred talents. It is said that Aristobulus prince of the Iewes sent the same. Straight after this, there came other fresh Embassadors vnto him (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus, from Aristobulus) who accused those that had taken money, namely Gabinus, for that he first of all had received three hundred talents beside other presents: & secondly Scaurus; who had received foure hundred; alledging that by that meanes they had incensed them against him. He therefore gaue direction, that they should repaire vnto him about the spring, each of them to iustifie and maintaine their seuerall rights: as for himselfe he drew his forces from their wintering places, and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certain forreile which B Antiochus the Cyzicenean had fortified in Apamea. Hee visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus (who was a peruerse and wicked man, & no waies differed from Dionysius Tripolitane) who was punished with the losse of his head, and was vnited also with him in friendship and affinity; yet acquired of the death hee delerued, by the meanes of a thousand talents raunsome, which Ptolomey distributed amongst his souldiers for their pay. He raised likewise the Castle of Lyfias (wherein a Iewe called Silas tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis, & hauing likewise ascended the mountaine (which is betwene them) he came to Coelosyria; and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gaue audience to the Iewes, and their princes Hircanus & Aristobulus, who were at odds the one against the other, as touching their particular interests, as al the whole nation against the both; alledging that they would not be gouerned by kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honored, affirming that these two brethren (who were descended of the race of Priests, sought to draw their nation vnder a different forme of gouernment, to the intent to reduce them vnder seruitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder borne, he had bin deprived of his inheritance by Aristobulus, and had onely but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incurfions, that both by land & sea Aristobulus followers had endamaged the frontiers with. For the people had not reuolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principalst of the Iewes (drawne on by Antipaters perswasion) subscribed, who auerred and iustified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the kingdom, by reason of his incapacitie and naturall defects; alledging for himselfe, that the gouernment was enforced on him by a necessitie, for feare it should be transported to others: in effect, he protested that he challenged no other title, then that which his father Alexander had had. Hee brought in also for his witnesses certaine arrogant yong men, who were hated for their pompe, purple robes, their curiosity in painting & curling their haire, and bard horse, and other braueries which they presented, not like men that intended to expect iudgement, but as if their pretence had been to make shew of their pompe. After that Pompey had heard them, hee condemned Aristobulus violence, but for that time hee dismissed them (after some fauourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their country, & determine their differents, after he had scene the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the meane while to liue in peace. He vsed Aristobulus likewise very kindly, fearing least he should incense the people, and shut vp his passage: which notwithstanding came to passe. For Aristobulus came into the Citie of Delion, and from thence went into Iudaea, without respect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

CHAP. VI.

Pompey maketh himselfe Lord of the Castles by a warlike stratageme.

Pompey hearing this, was sore displeased therewith; and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Roman companies that he had) hee marched forth against Aristobulus: when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behind him, hee came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Iudaea) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Castle situate vpon the top of a mountaine called Alexandrion, whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Embassadors to inuite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsaile of many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre against against the Romanes, came downe vnto him, & after he had debated his side with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to returne againe into his Castle. And this did he two or three times, alwaies flattering Pompey thorow the hope hee had of the kingdome, & making a shew that he would be obedient vnto him in whatsoever hee would commaund. Meane while he retired himselfe, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the waire, for feare least Pompey should transerre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliuer vp the fortresses that he held, and had written with his owne hand to the captaines of the garrisons (who otherwise would not haue obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Ierusalem, with full intent to prepare for waire. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certaine messengers comming from Pompey certified him of Mithridates death, who was slaine by his sonne Pharnaces.

CHAP. VII.

They of Ierusalem shut their gates against the Romanes.

When Pompey was encamped neer vnto Iericho (in which place there were a number of Date trees, and where also groweth that balme which is the most precious of all other ointments, distilling from a little shrub, which is opened and slit by a sharpe cutting stone) the next morning he marched towards Ierusalem. At that time Aristobulus (being sorry for his misbehaviour) came vnto him, offering him money: and promising him to receiue him into Ierusalem, he besought him, that (dismissing publike enmities & quarrels) he would peaceably doe what him listed hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condescended to his request, and sent Gabinus with his soldiers, both to receiue the money, as also to enter the citie; but his purpose failed him in both: for Gabinus returned, because he was excluded out of the citie; neither receiued he any money, for that Aristobulus soldiers would not permit that any promise should be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth; so that after hee had committed Aristobulus to prison, he went in person against the citie, which was strongly fortified on euery side, except toward the quarter that extendeth northward, which was easie to be beaten downe: for this side is inuironed with a large and deepe valley, compasing the Temple, which is inclosed with a marueilous strong wall of stone.

CHAP. VIII.

Pompey taketh the Temple, and lower part of the Citie perforce.

Within the city there grew a diuision & faction, by reason of the difference and dissident opinions of those that kept the same; for some thought good to yeeld vp the city into Pompeies hands; other some (that were of Aristobulus faction) counselled that the gates should be kept shut, & preparation for war should be made, for that the Romanes detained Aristobulus prisoner. These later preuailling more then the rest seized the temple: & breaking downe the bridge which was betwixt it & the citie, addressed themselves to stand on their defence. But the others not only deliuered the citie into Pompeies hands, but the royall palace also: who sent Piso his lieutenant thither with his forces to take possession thereof, & to plant his garrisons therein, & to fortify the houses neere adioining the temple, and whatsoever convenient habitation without the walles. First therefore Piso offered the besieged certaine conditions of peace: which for that they refused, he fortified and shut them in on euery side, being in all these his endeouours assisted by Hircanus. On the outside of the citie, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the temple (which was the easiest & meekest side to be assaulted) on this side also there were certaine high towers, and a huge trench, besides a deepe valley that begirt the temple. For towards the citie all waies and passages were so broken vp, that no man could either goe vp or downe, and the bridge was taken away on that side where Pompey was incamp. Each day did the Romanes trauell earnestly to raise a mount, and cutting downe all the timber round about them, & hauing sely applied the same, the trench being filled vp (although very hardly, by reason of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addressed, with which they enforced & darted stones against the temple: and had not the ordinance of the country commanded to keepe the Sabbath (which was the seventh day of the weeke) holy, and to labour in no sort on that day; the Romanes had neuer bin able to haue raised their bulwarke, if they within the temple had opposed themselves against them. For the law permit-permitteth to defend themselves against their enemies, at such time as they are assailed and urged to fight, but not assaile them when they intend any other worke. Which when the Romanes vnderstood, they neither gaue assault, nor proffered skirmish on those daies, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, and planted their engines; so that the next day they were ready to put them in use against the Iewes. And hereby it is easie to coniecture, how incredible the pietie of our nation is, & how studious and industrious they be in obseruing the diuine lawes. For notwithstanding any present or imminent feare, yet desired they neuer to offer their solemn sacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Priests offered vpon the altar; and notwithstanding any difficulty or danger of the siege that might happen, they omitted not the course of their oblations. For at such time as the temple was taken (in the third moneth and on a fasting day, in the hundredth teuentie nine Olympiade, in the yeere wherein Caius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Consuls) the enemy entered the temple by force, and slew those that withstood the. Yet notwithstanding all this, the priests ceased not to exercise their accustomed sacrifice: & neither the hazard of their liues, nor the great number of those that were dead, could force them to flie, but that they held it more conuenient for them to endure all things that might happen in attending vpon the Altar, then to transgress or vary one iota from their ordinances. And that this may seeme to be no fable, or praise of their dissembled deuotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all those that write the Histories concerning Pompey and his acts, doe witness no lesse: amongst the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Liuius the Romane Historiographer the most famous among the rest. The greatest of those towers was battered by these engines, & fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cause that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The first that ascended the wall, was Cornelius Faustus the sonne of Sylla, with his souldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with those that followed him, on the other side: and thorow the midst of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a strong squadron. The whole circuit was filled with murders; and some of the Iewes died by the Romanes swords; other some slew one another; the rest cast themselves downe headlong from the steepe places: many likewise set fire on their houses, and consumed themselves therein, for feare they should behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelue thousand Iewes, and very few Romanes. Abalom also, who was Aristobulus father in law, and vncle, was taken prisoner. The religion of the temple likewise was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entered or beheld that which was in the temple: Pompey & diuers others that accompanied him, entered the same, and saw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high priests only. But although he found a table of gold, and a sacred candlestick; with diuers other vessels and odoriferous drugs in great quantitie; and whereas besides that, there was about two thousand talents of silver in the sacred treasure in the temple: yet touched hee nothing thereof thorow the reuerence hee had of GOD, and herein hee behaued himselfe answerably to his other vertues. The next day he commaunded those that had the charge of the temple to purge the same, and to offer sacrifices vnto GOD, according to the law; committing the high priesthood to Hircanus hands, both for that hee had stood him in great steed in many things, as for that he had hindered the Iewes, that were of the countrey, from ioyning themselves with Aristobulus. After this, he headed the authors of this warre, and honoured Faustus and the rest with condigne gifts, who with great courage had first attempted and ascended the wall. As for Ierusalem, he made it tributary to the Romanes, taking away from the Iewes those Cities they had conquered in Coelosyria, and assigning the a proper and peculiar gouernment. After this, he inclosed the nation within certaine limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Nor long after this, hee repaired Gadara, that not long before was destroyed: all which he performed in fauour of Deme-trius the Gadarenian his late seruant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Marissa, Azot, Iamnia, and Arethusa, hee restored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were situate in the heart of the land: Besides Gaza, Ioppa, Dora, & the tower of Straton (cities situate vpon the sea coast, and ruined before times with diuers warres) he set at libertie, and annexed them vnto the prouince. As for the tower of Straton, it was magnificentie builded by Herode, and decked with gates and faire temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cæsarea. Thus Hircanus and Aristobulus thorow their dissensions and ciuill broiles, were the cause of that seruitude and misery that fell vpon the Iewes. For we haue lost our libertie, and haue bene subdued by the Romanes. Besides that; wee haue bene enforced to surrender vp those cities vnto the Syrians, which we before time by force of armes had conquered

And that which is to be lamented, the Romans in a litle time haue drawn G from vs more then tenne thousand talents: and the roialtie which before time was an honour re- serued for those that were of the race of the high priests, hath been bestowed on men of obsequie and communie: wherof we will speake in place conuenient. After that Pompey had giuen Caele- syria to Scaurus, from Euphrates as farre as to the frontiers of Egypt, with two legions of the Romans; he went into Cilicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Aristobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two sonnes, and two daughters) one of which called Alexander, escaped by flight; and as touching Antigonus (who was the younger) he was led to Rome with his sisters.

When as therefore his army was pressed with famine, Antipater by the commaundement of Hircanus, furni- shed him with corne, and all other necessities out of Iewry. Who beeing sent Embassador to A- retas from Scaurus, in that hee had sometime sojourned with him, perswaded him to contribute a certaine summe of siluer to warrantize his countrey from pillage; and hee himselfe also became pledge for three hundred talents. This done, Scaurus finished the war, according to his desire, and with no lesse contentment to Aretas and his countrey.

Castles forti-

NOT long after this, Alexander Aristobulus sonne, made diuers inroads into Iewry: for which cause Gabinus came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which hee achieued) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hir- canus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, beeing otherwise exercised in build- ing the walles of Ierusalem that were beaten downe by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans K that were in Iewrie hindered him from performing the same. This Alexander traouailing thorow the whole countrey, assembled diuers Iewes; so that in short time, hauing gotten together tenne thousand foemen, and fiftene hundred horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alex- andrion neere vnto the Citie of Cores. He fortified Machæron also in the mountaines of Ara- bia. Gabinus therefore came forth against him, hauing sent before him Marcus Antonius accom- panied with other chieftaines of warre, who armed the Romans of their traine and the Iewes that were vnder their obedience, whose captaines were Pitholaus and Malichus. They tooke also those allies whom Antipater had hired, & in this equipage came they to make head against Alex- ander. Gabinus also seconded them with his troups. Hereupon Alexander drew more neer with his army towards Ierusalem, where waging battel with the Romans, hee lost about three thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this Gabinus re- paired to Alexandrion, and inuited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the rebellion they had begun. And where as many of his enemies had encamped themselves before the fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adiuaged to haue behaued himselfe very valiantly, in that he slew diuers of his enemies. Gabinus left a part of his armie in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof, he might goe and visit the coun- try of Iudæa: he commaunded therefore all those cities, which in his journey he found either deso- late or destroyed, to be repaired: so that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with diuers others, were new builded: so that thorow the obedience that was giuen to Gabinus commaund, it came to passe that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had laine long time before desert.

He ordained also fise iudgement seates and places of session, and diuided the prouince into answerable parts: for the one answered in Ierusa- lem; the second at Gadara; the third in Amatha; the fourth at Ierico; and the fift at Saphora; which is a towne of Galilee. BUT Aristobulus flying from Rome, returned into Iewrie, and determined to reedifie the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruined. Against him Gabinus sent out certaine men of warre with their captaines, namely Sisenna, Antonius and Seruilus, both to keep him from the possession of the place, as to apprehend and surprise him likewise. For many Iewes resorted vnto him, beeing drawne thereunto by the auncient reputation that hee had: who desired likewise to worke innouations. Pitholaus also (who was established Lieutenant ge- nerrall in Ierusalem) of his own accord came vnto him, with a thousand men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the most part were not sufficiently furnished with armes; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Machæron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed; and were vnapt for any execution, & retaining onely eight thousand well armed men; hee tooke the field and marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and ouertaking him, fought desperately with him, and quercame both him and his, notwithstanding their valiant resist. Bec- ing therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, & about fise thousand of them were slaine; and the rest disperfed, wandring heere and there, sought for their owne priuate securities: but Aristobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thousand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affaires had very slender successe; yet lost he not his hope: but after he had endu- red the siege some two daies, and received many wounds, he was taken prisoner, and with his son

But Gabinus, in- tending to make warre against the Parthians, and hauing already past Euphrates, changed his re- solution; and determined to returne into Egypt, and reestablished Ptolomey, as it is declared in an other place. In this expedition also he was furnished by Antipaters meanes, with victuals, money and munition; and by his aduice, those Iewes that inhabite Pelusium (who kept as it were the ve- ry entry into Egypt) were drawne into his societie. out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult and rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus sonne, ta- king once more possession of the kingdome, caused diuers Iewes from day to day to revolt; and forraging the countrey with a huge armie, he slew all those Romans whom he met withall, & be- sieged all those that fledde into the mount Garizim. Gabinus seeing the affaires of Syria in that e- state, sent Antipater before him vnto them to appease these commotions, and to heale the of their frenzie, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was a man of good discretion. In effect, he repairing vnto them, moderated diuers of them, and brought them vnder obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander, for hee hauing thirtie thou- sand souldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinus, with whom he fought, and was ouer- come, with the losse of some ten thousand of his men, neere vnto the mount Itabyr.

After that Gabinus had ordered all things in Ierusalem by Antipaters aduice, he presently set forward against the Nabatheans, whom hee ouercame in battell. Hee sent backe also Mithridates & Orsanes (men of good reckoning among the Parthians) who had retired themselves vnto him, causing a bruit to be spread, that they were fled with Gabinus. Now when Gabinus had perform- ed great & maghificent exploits in warre, hee returned to Rome, surrendering the government to Craffus, Nicholas, Damascene, and Strabo of Cappadocia (who discreth in nothing from Ni- cholas) haue written of these expeditions of Pompey, and Gabinus in Iudæa.

Crassus break-

Whence the temple of Ie-rusalem grew so rich.
Strabo of Cappadocia.

C Rassus intending to make warre against the Parthians, came into Iewry and tooke a way with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the summe of two thousand talents.) He spoiled the temple al of all the gold that was in the same, to the sum of 8000 talents. Furthermore, hee bare away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of three hundredth pounds, which pound amongst the Iewes containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that deliuered him this ingot, was a Priest, and the keeper of the sacred treasure, called Eleazar, who gaue him the same vpon no malicious intent (for he was a ver- tuous and iust man) but whereas hee had the custodie of the tapestries of the temple, committed to his hands (which both were admirable to behold, by reason of their beautie and esteeme, and withall were in like sort tied and fastned to this beame) and perceiuing that Crassus sought all the means that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing least he should haue seized on all the ornaments of the temple, gaue him this beame for a ranfome to redeeme all the rest: bin- ding him vpon the deliuerie thereof by an oath, that hee should not take any thing away that was in the temple, but should content himselfe with that onely piece of great esteeme & vawew, which he gaue him. This beame was inclosed in another hollow beame of wood; so that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Crassus therefore tooke this beame, as if he determined to leaue all o- ther things in the temple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and caried away whatsoever was therein. Neither is it to bee wondred at, that there was so great riches found in our temple, sith all those Iewes that were disperfed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all those that fea- red God (both in Asia and in Europe) for a long time offered their presents in that place. The greatnesse and multitude whereof wanteth no testimonie: neither is it fained in way of offensa- tion, but diuers other Historians make mention thereof: and amongst the rest, Strabo of Cappa- docia speaketh after this manner. And Mithridates sent men into the Isle of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that queene Cleopatra had laid vp there, & eight hundredth talents of the Iewes. But wee haue no publike money, but that which is dedicated vnto God. It is therefore a thing most manifest, that the Iewes that inhabit Asia, transported this money into Coos, for the feare that they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they, who inhabited Iudæa, and had a Citie so strong, and a temple so well defended, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Iewes remaining in Alexandria should do it, for that they feared not to fall into danger thorow this warre of Mithridates. The same Strabo also saith in another place, that at such time as Sylla passed thorow Greece to make warre against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent men to Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and saith thus: There were foure sorts of people in the Citie of the Cyrenians: One of the were Citizens; the second were Labourers; the third were Sojourners; & the fourth were Iewes, who at this present are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, neither was there any nation that inhabit the same, wherein these I have not set foote and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being vnder the subiection of the same princes) and diuers other regions, conformed themselves to their customes, and nourished assemblies of Iewes, and aduanced them, and more and more vsed the Iewish ordinances. It ap- peareth therefore that there was a colony of Iewes in Egypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the Citie is assigned to this nation. They haue likewise their peculiar magistrate, who gouerneth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their con- tracts and ordinances, as if he gouerned in his owne common-weale. By this meanes, this nation hath fortified and established it selfe in Egypt, for that the Iewes had their originall amongst the Egyptians, and for that Iudæa is neere vnto Egypt, from whence the Iewes are descended: And as touching Cyrene, they haue entred it, in that it confineth that country, which is vnder the obedience of the Egyptians (in like manner as Iudæa doth) or rather for that in times past it ap- pertained to the same kingdom. Thus farre Strabo.

After that Crassus had disposed all things according to his owne pleasure, hee dislodged and marched forward to make warre against the Parthians, where both he and all his armie were de- stroied (as it is declared in another place.) As for Cassius, he retired himselfe into Syria, & rooke possession thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians; who being proud of their victorie lately

He put Pitholaus also to death, for that he maintained Aristobulus faction. All which he did by Antipaters procurement and instigation, who was in great credit with him, and who also at that time was highly esteemed amongst the Idumæans: amongst whom hee married his wife, who was descended of one of the most famous families of Arabia, her name was Cypron, by who he had these foure sonnes: Phasaelus, & Herode (who after was made king) Ioseph and Pheroras, & one daughter called Salome. This Antipater also made alliance with other Princes, and especially with the Arabian; to whose custodie he committed his children, during the time hee made wara- gainst Aristobulus. But Cassius gathered another army, & marched towards Euphrates to make head against the Parthians, as it is specified and registred by other Writers.

Pompey retireth himselfe into Epirus, and Scipio commeth into Syria.

Non after this, Cesar (being Lord of Rome) after that Pompey and the Senate were fled on the other side of the Ionian sea, sette Aristobulus at liberty, determining to send him into Syria, with two legions; as being a sufficient man to gouerne the state affaires in that quarter. Naithlesse, Aristobulus failed of his hopes and authoritie hee expected at Cesars hands: For Pompeys partakers preuented and poisoned him, where-through he died; so that hee was buried by thole of Cesars faction. His body was kept embalmed with honey for a long time, vntill that Antonius sent it into Iury, to be entombed among the kings & Princes. Scipio, by Pompeys commandement, caused Alexander Aristobulus sonnes head to be cut off, charging him with some misdemeanors which he had committed against the Romanes, and after this manner finished he his daies being executed in Antioch. Ptolomey the sonne of Mnna- us, who gouerned in Chalcis (at the foore of the mount Libanus) rooke his brothers, and sent his sonne Philippion to Alcalon to Aristobulus wife, commaunding her to send her sonne Antigonus and his daughters; one of which, called Alexandra, was beloued by Philippion, & married by him; but afterwards he being slaine, Ptolomey Philippions father married her, and continued the care- full maintenance of his brethren in law.

Cæsars voyage into Egypt, wherein he was assisted by the faithfull seruice of the Iewes.

After Pompeys death, & that victory which Cesar had obtained against him, Antipater (go- uernour of Iudæa by the commandement of Hircanus) was very profitable vnto Cesar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certaine supplies, and could not bring them on, by reason of an arme of Nilus pausing thorow Pelusium; but was constrained to stay at Alcalon: Antipater came vnto him, and brought with him three thousand souldiers, and so dealt with the Princes of Arabia to associate them with Cesar, that by his meanes, all they of Syria gaue him their assistance, and neuer altered their affection that they bare vnto Cesar. These were Iamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his sonne, & Tholomeus the sonne of Sohemus, dwell- ing on the mount of Libanus, and welny all the Cities. Mithridates beeing departed from Syria, came to Pelusium, where being repulsed and excluded by the Citizens, he besieged the citie. Antipater in this war behaued himselfe valiantly, and after hee had beaten downe a pane of the wall, he first of all set forward to enter the Citie. Whilst Pelusium was in this estate, the Iewes that in- habited Egypt in the country of Onias, would neither grant passage to Antipater, nor Mithri- dates that marched towards Cesar. But Antipater, who was of their nation, perswaded them to take their parts, shewing them the letters of the high priest Hircanus, in which he inuited them to be friends vnto Cesar, and exhorted them to furnish his army in whatsoeuer they stood in need of; so that seeing that Antipater & the high Priest were accorded together, they submitted the- selves. They that dwelt round about Memphis, hearing that they were thus vnited, sent for Mithridates also vnto them; who came and receiued them into his fauour.

NHen hee was come to a place called Delta, hee fought with his enemies in a place, which is called the campe of the Jewes: in which battell Mithridates ledde the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handie blowes, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfited, had not Antipater (running with his souldiers along the bank of the riuer) obtained the vpper hand of his enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were conquerers to flight, and restoring Mithridates. And so long pursued he them that he got their camp, and called back Mithridates, who chased the Egyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that hee had recovered from the fugitiue enemy. In this fight there fell eight hundredth on the enemies side, and fiftie on Antipaters. Afterwards, Mithridates wrote heereof vnto Cæsar, and certified him that Antipater was cause of the victorie, and their preservation: so that Cæsar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his warre he made vse of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts: VWhereby it came to passe that Antipater was grievously wounded in diuers fights.

Now after that the warre was finished, Cæsar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hircanus to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Diuers men report that Hircanus himselfe was an agent in this warre, and that he came into Egypt: vwhereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, (speaking after this manner by the authoritie of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entered Egypt, with Hircanus the high Priest of the Jewes. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authoritie of Hippocrates, that Mithridates issued alone, & that Antipater was sent for into A scalon, where he prepared three thousand souldiers, because hee was gouernour of Iudæa, and encouraged the rest of the gouernours; and Hircanus the high Priest also had a part in this warre. Thus saith Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne, to Cæsar, lamenting vnto him the inconuenient that had befallen his father, and how hee was slaine by poison in his seruice, and how his brother had his head strooken off by Scipio; beseeching him to haue compulsion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the kingdom. He K accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannicall and violent government ouer their nation, and iniuries offered to himselfe. Antipater beeing at that time present, answered for himselfe in those points wherein he was accused; declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himselfe how much he had traualled, and how many exploits he had executed, in the late warre, whereof Cæsar himselfe was a witnesse. Moreover, hee auowed that Aristobulus had bene iustly led twice into captiuitie to Rome, for that he had been alwaies an enemy, and no waies well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he auerred that he was iustly punished by him, for his Larcinies, & not iniuriously and outragiously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hircanus high Priest, and gaue Antipater any government whatsoeuer best him L liked: who according to his choice, was appointed prefect in Iudæa.

The Senates
decree as tou-league with the Jewes.

NOreouer Cæsar permitted Hircanus to repaire the walles of Ierusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten the down, they lay leuelled with the earth; & he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that this decree should be registered in the Capitol. The example of which ordinance of the Senate containeth matter to this effect; Lucius Valerius the son of Lucius the Pretor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the temple of Concord the 13 day of December) in the presence of L. Caponius the son of Lucius, & Caius Papyrius Quirinus; the requests made by Alexander the son of Iason, Numenius the son of Antiochus, & Alexander the son of Dorotheus, Embassadors in the behalfe of the Jewes, men of good regard, & our allies, and proposed by them in renewing the ancient fauours they haue receiued from the Romanes: and in testimonie of the confederation; haue brought

As a violl and buckler of gold of fiftie thousand crownes price, requiring our letters might bee giuen them, addressed to the free Cities and the kings our confederates, to grant them passage thorough their countries and ports with all securitie, and without any offence. And wee haue thought good to make friendship and alliance with them and to grant them all that which they require, in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was high priest and prince, and in the ninth yeere of his principedome, in the month of Iuly.

Hircanus was in like sort honored by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendships that they receiued at his hands. They sent him also a decree which they ratified in his behalfe, the tenor whereof ensueth: The yeere wherein Dionysius the sonne of Asclepiades was gouernour, and priest, in the moneth of Iuly, and on the 20. day this arrest or decree of the Athenians was deliuered to the gouernours by the Pretor Agathocles. Euclestis the sonne of Menander the Alimusiath hath written it the eleuenth of March in the assembly generally, and placed it in the Theater, and the suffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the high priest, with the chiefe assistants of the people. Dionysius the sonne of Dionysius published the same: Since that Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high priest and prince of the Jewes, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in especiall towards euery Citizen of Athens, and hath shewed them many friendships, receiuing with all humanitie those Athenians that come vnto him, whether they resort thither as Embassadors, or for any other particular occasion whatsoeuer, & sencerth them backe after they haue provided them of safe conduct, whereof wee haue heretofore had testimonie by the report of Theodorus, the sonne of Theodorus Simens; who hath made recital vnto the people of his worthinesse, and of the will he hath to doe vs all the good that is possible: VVee haue thought good to honour him by lending him a crowne of gold in testimonie of his curtesies, according to our custome and law; and by erecting a brazen statue vnto him in the temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our will is also that this be proclaimed by a herald in the Theater, during the Bacchanals, and at such time as the new Tragedies are plaid. Likewise in the solemnities Panathean and Eleusynian, and at the publike exercises: wee will also that the gouernours provide, that all that which we haue aduised for the honour, fauour, affection and good will toward this man, as hee hath well deserued, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appeare how our nation reward, & entertain such men as are vertuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart vnto him, may prouoke others to be the better affected towards vs. It is likewise decreed, that amongst all the Athenians there be certaine Embassadors chosen, who shall beare this Decree vnto him, and exhort him to doe whatsoeuer is profitable for our common good, seeing himselfe so much honoured by vs. Let this suffice to expresse the honours bestowed on Hircanus by the people of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

After that Cæsar had giuen order for the affaires of Syria, hee returned backe by sea. And as soone as Antipater had brought Cæsar out of Syria, he returned into Iudæa, & sodainly builded vp the walles which were before time defaced by Pompey; and in riding circuit about the countrey, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces; but by counsailes also, which hee gaue euery one to liue in peace; certifying them that if they submitted themselves to Hircanus their prince, they should liue happily, and enioy their possessions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to aduance themselves by any new commotion (supposing by that meanes to profit themselves some way) they should seele that in steed of a gouernor, they had a master; and in steed of a king, they should finde Hircanus a tyrant; and in steed of the Romans and Cæsar to be their gouernors, they should seele and finde them to be their most hateful enemies, for that they would not suffer, that any thing should be altered that they had established. By these and such like admonitions, hee kept and continued all the countrey in peace.

Antipater committeth the government of Galilee to his sonne Herod, and that of Ierusalem to Phalaclus his other sonne: and how Sextus Cæsar aduanceth Herod to great honours and dignities.

Antipater perceiuing that Hircanus was slow and idle, he declared and appointed Phalaclus his eldest sonne gouernour ouer Ierusalem, and the countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was verie young, for hee was not at that time about fiftene yeeres old) hee committed Galilee vnto his charge: who although he were young in yeeres, yet did not his tender age any waies preiudice him because hee was of a noble spirit, and found out this sodaine occasion to expresse that vertue that was in him. For hauing apprehended Ezechias, who was the prince of those theues, who ranged ouer all Syria a long time with a great troupe of outlawes, he put him to death with diuers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that meanes he rid their countrey of all those robbers, according as they desired. Hee was therefore praised thorow the villages, and Cities for this act, as he that had giuen them peace, and assured possession of their estates. For this cause he was made knowne to Sextus Caesar, who was vncle to Caesar the great. Furthermore his brother Phaelus was incited to follow his noble actions, and enforced himselfe to obtaine no lesse reputation then he had; for which cause he stroue to get the good wil of the common people in Ierusalem, & gouerned the citie with such discretiō, that hee acted all things to each mans content, & abused not his power to any priuat mans iniurie: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no lesse respect then if hee had been their only Lord & soueraigne. Yet did not this eminence of estate so farre distrust him, that he forgot the loue and dutie he ought to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding diuers of the greatest amongst the Iewes (seeing Antipater and his sonnes to highly aduanced both by the publike fauour of the whole nation, as also by the reuenues, that they drew both out of Iewry, as also by the employment of Hircanus money) were grievously incited against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperours of Rome, and hauing perswaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same vnto himselfe, sending it not in Hircanus name, but in his owne; which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not moued therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the princes of the Iewes was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who gouerned after a royall and tyrannicall manner: For this cause they addrest themselves to Hircanus and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) wil you dissemble and winke at those things that are daily practiced: see you not that Antipater and his sons possesse in effect the royall power and authority of the kingdome, & that you haue onely the name? Assure your selfe: you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your life and your kingdome. For Antipater and his sonnes are not now your substitutes, neither intend they you. profit, or your countries good (whatsoeuer your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and Commanders. For Herod (Antipater's son) hath already put Ezechias and his complices to death, and thereby transgressed our lawes, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soeuer hee be) except hee bee first of all condemned to death by the councell: and notwithstanding this, he hath been so bold, as to doe iustice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slaine, had incited him by their continuall exclamations in the temple, exhorting the king and people to call Herod to account before the councell of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moued by these wordes, called Herod to answer vnto those accusations which were objected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himselfe after the manner of a priuate person, but wel attended and accompanied to withstand all inconuenients. After therefore he had taken order for the affaires in Galilee (according as hee thought meet in his owne discretiō) and that he himselfe was sufficiently accompanied to make his voyage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leaue himselfe vnsecured in danger, he resorted to Ierusalem. Furthermore, Sextus Caesar gouernour of Syria wrote vnto Hircanus to absolue him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so hee should performe the contrarie; which gaue Hircanus occasion to deliuer Herod in despite of the councell and their intent; the rather also for that he loued him as intirely as his sonne. When as therefore Herod presented himselfe before the councell with his retinue, all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speake one worde, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to doe. Now whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, a certaine man called Sameas, who was of vpriight conuersation, and for this cause was not distracted with feare, arose and spake to this effect. O drad king, and you honourable assistants, I could neuer yet remember, that euer any man which was called in question to defend his cause before vs, hath appeared in this equipage; and I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath euer happened: but whosoever cometh into this place to receiue iudgement; hee presenteth himselfe with humilitie and feare, with a countenance prepared to implore mercie, hauing his haire long, and his garment blacke: but this gallant Herod accused of murder (and for this occasion called before vs) who could imagine that hee should appeare before vs in a purple robe, hauing his haire trimmed, and besides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 19. Hircanus embassadours to Caesar.

The Iews much honoured by the kings of Europe and Asia.

Iulius Caesar testified in a brazen pillar that the Iewes were free citizens of Alexandria. Iulius Caesar's decree touching the honors, immunities and priviledges granted to the Iewes.

A that if wee condemne him, according to law, he may put vs to death without lawe, that after hee hath violated all right, he might escape and saue himselfe. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that hee hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law: but I accuse both you and the king, who haue giuen him such assurance. Know therefore, that there is a soueraign God, that will one day punish both you and the king, and him whome you will deliuer by the kings meanes. And so generally fell it out as he had said: For as soone as Herod had obtained the kingdome, hee put all those of the councell to death, and Hircanus himselfe likewise, onely Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great estimation, because of his wisdom and iustice, and because that at such times as the Citie was besieged by Herod and Sosius, Sameas perswaded the people to receiue Herod, telling them that by reason of their sins and offences, they might not escape from him; whereof we will speak in place conuenient. Hircanus, perceiving that the iudges were inclined to condemne Herod, deferred the sentence till the next day, and sent secretly vnto Herod, counsailling him to flie out of the Citie, assuring him that there was no other meanes to saue his life. Thus posted he to Damasco (as if hee fled from the kings presence) and presenting himselfe before Sextus Caesar, after he had assured his person, he resolved with himselfe that if the councell should call him once more to his answer, hee would not obey them. But after his departure the councell were displeased with Hircanus, & laboured to perswade him; that all these things tended to his destruction: which he well perceived, yet knew he not what to doe; he was so negligent and void of foresight.

C When Sextus had made Herod gouernour of Coelosyria (which estate he sold vnto him for ready money) Hircanus was affraid lest Herod should make war against him: neither passed there long time before the effect grew answerable to his feare. For Herod marched forth against him with a great army, supposing himselfe to be much wronged by the assignation hee had sent him, and in that he was summoned to giue a reason of his actions before the councell. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phaelus came forth against him to hinder his approche towards Ierusalem, striving to appease his fury, and counsailling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himselfe that hee had threatened and affrighted Hircanus, hee should not attempt any further against him, who had raised him to that high degree. They told him also, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to answer, but that hee was absolved also, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreover, that hee ought to thinke, that God gouerneth the ballance of warre, and that the issue of battels is vncertaine, & for that cause he ought not to expect the victorie, if he made warre against the king who was his familiar, and from whom he had received farre more kindeesse, and no displeasure: who though he made some appearance and shadow of seueritie, touching the accusation intended against him, yet notwithstanding it proceeded not so much from him, as from his euill counsellors. Herod in some sort pacified by these perswasions, obeyed his father, supposing that it sufficed him in regard of his future hopes, that hee had giuen the people so large a testimonie of his power. This was the estate of the Iewes at that time.

F But Caesar arriuing at Rome, prepared himselfe to set saile towards Affricke, with an intent to make warre against Scipio and Cato. To him Hircanus sent Embassadours, beseeching him to confirme the amitie and association that he had with him. But now at this present, I thinke it very conuenient to declare all the prerogatiues, and associations that the Romans and their Emperours haue made with those of our nation, to the end that all other people might knowe, that the kings of Asia and Europe haue bene well affected towards vs, and haue made great account of our valour and fidelitie. And although diuers men lewdly affected towards vs, beleuee not that which the Macedonians and Persians haue writen of vs, because the same matters are not extant in all places, neither set downe in publike writings, but only amongst our selues and some Barbarians; yet is it manifest that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans, which are manifestly affixed in publike places in Cities; as likewise also at this present they are writen in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Iulius Caesar, in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared vnto the Iews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein. And to the intent that these things may more manifestly appeare, I will propose the decrees of the Senate, and of Iulius Caesar, made in fauour of Hircanus and our nation. Caius Iulius Caesar Emperour, high Priest, Dictator the second time, so the gouernours, Senate and people of the Romans: Health. If you are well, we are in health, both our selues and our army. I haue sent you the copy of an inscription, registred in fauour of Hircanus Alexander sonne, high priest and prince of the Iewes, to the end it may be placed among your publike monuments, and by will is, that it be engrauen in a table of brasse, both in Greek and Latin letters; the tenour whereof is this that followeth: Because Hircanus Alexanders sonne the Iew, both at this present as also heretofore, as well in peace as in warre, hath expressed his fidelitie towards vs and our estate, as diuers chieftaines of our armies yeeld testimonie of him; and for that in our last Alexandrine warre, hee seconded vs in the battell with fiftene hundred men; and hauing bene sent by vs to Mithridates, hath surmounted all those of his company in valour. For these causes my wil is that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his successors, be princes of the Iewes: and further, that they continue alwaies in the high Priesthood, according to the ordinance and custome of their country: & that both he and his children be our associates: and be enrowled likewise amongst our chieft friends: and that all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according to the ordinances of the Iewes, be attributed to him and his. And if there happen any different as touching the discipline of the Iewes, our pleasure is, that it be determined by him. And as touching the munitions of winter, and the money to be leuied for the entertainment of souldiers, wee thinke it not meete that they should be charged. The decrees made and granted by Caius Caesar being Consul are these.

That the sonnes of Hircanus be Princes ouer the nation of the Iewes, and inioye the places granted vnto them. That the high Priest and Prince of the Iewes giue fauour and aide vnto those that are offended. That Embassadours be sent to Hircanus the sonne of Alexander high Priest of the Iewes, to intreat of amity & association with vs. That a brassen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the temples, wherein shall be engrauen the contents hereof in Romane and Greeke letters, to the end that all the treasurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our decree vnderstand, that they are our friends, and that their Embassadours be entertained with kindnesse and presents, and that these edicts be sent into all places.

Caius Caesar Emperour, Dictator, Consul, for the good of the Senate and people of Rome, hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanitie of Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, that both hee and his children shall be High Priests in Ierusalem, and of the whole Nation, according to the rites and customes, whereby their auncestors haue enioyed the Priesthood.

Caius Caesar, Consul the fift time, hath ordained that they shall inhabite Ierusalem, and build againe the walles of the Citie; and that Hircanus (Alexanders sonne, the high priest and prince of the Iewes) shall gouerne as best him liketh, and that euery second yeere of their tribute, there be a Chore deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from all other impositions, and tributes.

Caius Caesar, twice Emperour, hath ordained, that the Iewes shall contribute euery yeere for their cities, except Ioppe; he acquiteth them also euery seuen th yeere (which they call the yeere of rest) because that therein they neither reape, nor sowe, neither gather the fruites of trees. His further pleasure is, that euery second yeere, they bring their tributes vnto Sidon, which shall be the fourth part of that which shall be sowed; and besides this, that they pay the tenths to Hircanus and his sonnes, which they haue paid to their predecessours vnto this day. Commanding that no man whether he be gouernour, captiue, or embassadour, or any other whatsoever hee be, leuie souldiers within the country of Iudaea, or draw any thereof: neither exact any money, whether it be for garrisons in winter, or for any other cause, but that the Iewes be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enioy all that which sithence they haue had, bought, and possessed. It is our pleasure also, that the citie of Ioppe be vnder their gouernment (which they haue euery enioyed since the beginning of their friendship with the Romanes.) We further grant, that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his children, receiue the tribute of that Citie (both by them, that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and issues of merchandizes that are transported vnto Sidon) twentie thousand sixe hundredth, seuentie and siue bushels euery yeere, exempting the seuenth yeere, which is called the yeere of rest, wherein they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the trees. It is the Senates pleasure also, that Hircanus and the Iewes haue those villages, which are in the great champain, which he & his predecessours haue possessed, and that with the like interests that they held them before this; and that the same customes continue therein, whereby they held and gouerned them. Their wil is likewise, that the same lawes which haue from the beginning bene respectively obserued betwene the Iewes and their high priests be continued; and what fouer benefits were granted them by the consent of the Senate and people of Rome. Moreover it shall be lawfull for those of Lydda, to vse the same rites and priuiledges also. And as touching the

A the demaies, places, and habitations that haue appertained to the kings of Syria and Phoenicia, by the gift made vnto them at such time as they were allied to the Romanes: the Senate I say ordaineth, that Hircanus the high priest & prince of the Iewes possesse the same. It is lawfull also for Hircanus and his sonnes, and their Embassadours sent by them, to behold the iusts and combats, and to sit among the Senators, and that at all and euery time or times wherein they shall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the master of the horse, they may haue free entrance; and that within ten daies at the most they receiue their answers, if there be any decree ratified by the Senate.

Caius Caesar, Emperour, the fourth time Consul, & the fift time Dictator for terme of life, hath ratified these things, as touching Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high priest and prince of the Iewes: Because that the generals my predecessours haue testified as well in the provinces, as before the Senate and people of Rome, both of the good desert of Hircanus high priest and prince of the Iewes, and that nation also towards vs and our state; and whereas both the Senate and people of Rome haue gratified them for the same: we thinke it conuenient also to haue the same in memorie, and to giue order that Hircanus and his sonnes may be remunerated by the Senate and people of Rome, according to the measure of their loyalties and good deserts.

Iulius Caius Caesar Romane Consul, to the gouernours, Senate and people of Patras: Health. The Iewes are come vnto vs to Delos, with some of the colonies of their countie in the presence of your Embassadours, and certifie vs of a decree made by you, whereby you forbid them the practise and auncient vse of their sacrifices and oblations: I thinke it not meete that you make any such decrees against our friends, and associates; neither that you forbid them to liue according to their fashions and customes, or to employ their parties together in furnishing their feasts and sacrifices; since in Rome it selfe they are not interdicted or forbidden to performe the same. For at such time as Caius Caesar Consul had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchicals, no one should dance about the Citie: yet were the Iewes alone exempted from this inhibition; and neither haue they bene prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together. My selfe also in like case in the defence I haue made to forbid all other sodalities, haue excepted the Iewes therein, and haue giuen them leaue and licence to assemblable and demean themselves, according to the customes, ceremonies, and ordinances of their country. If therefore you haue made any such decrees against our friends & associates, you shall do well to disannull them, by reason of the vertue of the Iewes, and the forwardnes they haue protested in performance of our seruice.

After Caius Caesars death, the Consuls Marcus Antonius and Publius Dolabella assembled the Senate, and hauing brought in Hircanus Embassadours, they declared their requests, & contracted amitie with them: the Senate likewise ordained, that each thing should be granted them that they required. And Dolabella hauing receiued Hircanus letters, sent them thorow al Asia, and to Ephesus (which is the Metropolitane citie of Asia) in these tearmes. The generall Dolabella to the Princes, Senate, and people of Ephesus: Health. Alexander the sonne of Theodore Embassadour to Hircanus the high priest and prince of the Iewes, hath giuen vs to vnderstand, that his subiects cannot go on warfare, because it is not lawfull for them to beare armes, nor to traueil on the Sabbath day; as also for that they may not seeke for their victuals and other necessities (on that day) according to the custome of their country: for this cause I grant them exemption from the warre in like maner as my predecessours haue done; permitting them to vse the ceremonies and rites of their country assembling themselves to make their oblations and sacrifices, as their lawes and customes require, in contributing to the offering of the sacrifices in the temple. And my wil is, that you write to this effect to euery citie of the province. See here how Dolabella honoured Hircanus at such time as he sent his Embassadours vnto him.

Lucius Lentulus Consul pronounceth that the Iewes (that are citizens of Rome) and that obserue and offer the sacrifices of the Iewes in Ephesus before the tribunall, bee exempt from warfare, by reason of their religion. Giuen the nineteenth of October. There are besides these many other Edicts and ordinances made to the like effect, by the same generals, and by the Romane Senate in fauour of Hircanus and our nation, and some other cities. In like sort there were diuers decrees and writs sent vnto the gouernours & rulers of the provinces touching our priuiledges: all which may be easily beleued by those that shall read our Historie, with no preiudicate opinion, if they consider those that we haue here inserted. For wee haue shewed more expresse and liuely testimonies of the friendship that wee haue had with the Romanes, and such as at this day

M. Antonius
